CHAPTER I.

Frankfort.

In the summer of 1822 I was living in my native town of Frankfort—beautiful Frankfort—and, though barely eleven, was just beginning to be known in the town as "the little pianoforte player with the long hair." The long hair was the best known thing about me, I think, for it was very long; still, I had actually played in public once, which my school-fellows thought a great wonder. I had been taught the piano by Aloys Schmitt, in a very irregular fashion, for he was always traveling; but he was fond of me, and I had quite a passion for him. The winter before, Schmitt had been in Berlin, and on his return told us of a wonderful boy, a grandson of Moses Mendelssohn the philosopher, who was not only a splendid player, but had composed quartets, symphonies, operas! Now I had composed too—Polonaises and Rondos, and variations on "Schone Minka," which I thought extremely brilliant; and I worked at harmony and counterpoint, under the venerable old Vollweiler, with the greatest diligence. But that a boy, only two or three years older than myself, should be conducting the band to his own operas, seemed to me unheard of. True, I had read the same thing about Mozart; but then it was Mozart, and he was more a demigod than a musician. So I was not a little excited when Schmitt came to us one day with the news that Felix Mendelssohn was in Frankfort, with his father, mother, brother, and sisters, and that he, Schmitt, should bring him to see us the next day.
Mendelssohn.

The house in which we lived really consisted of two—one tolerably modern, looking onto the river, and the other, an older one, adjoining the first, and facing a narrow street, which contained the only entrance to both houses. The windows at the back of the modern house overlooked the court, and one of them commanded the narrow passage leading from it to the house door. At this window I took my stand at the hour which Schmitt had named for his visit, and, after waiting some time in the greatest impatience, was rewarded by seeing the door open and my master appear. Behind him was a boy, only a little bigger than myself, who kept leaping up till he contrived to get his hands onto Schmitt's shoulders, so as to hang on his back and be carried along for a few steps, and then slip off again. "He's jolly enough," thought I, and ran off to the sitting-room to tell my parents that the eagerly expected visitor had arrived. But great was my astonishment when I saw this same wild boy enter the room with quite a grave dignity, and, though very lively and talkative, yet all the time preserving a certain formality. He himself made even a greater impression on me than the account of his performances had done, and I could not help feeling a little shy during the whole of the visit.

The next day Schmitt called again, to take me to the Mendelssohns. I found the whole family assembled in a great room at the "Swan" hotel, and was very kindly received. I shall never forget the impression made on me by the mother—whom I was never to see again. She was sitting at work at a little table, and inquired about all that I was doing with an infinite kindness and gentleness that won my childish confidence from the very beginning.

There was a Frankfort quartet party in the room, but besides these I remember only young Edward Deyrient, who pleased me very much, not only by his good looks and graceful ways, but also by his exquisite singing of an air of Mozart's. We had a great deal of music: Felix played one of his quartets—in C minor, if I recollect right; but I was most impressed by his sister Fanny's performance of Hummel's "Rondeau brilliant in A," which she played in a truly masterly style. Meantime I became more intimate with Felix, and at his second visit he astonished me immensely. I was showing him a violin sonata of Schmitt's, when he at once took up a violin which lay on the piano, and asked me to play the sonata with him, and he got through his part very cleverly and well, though the brilliant passages were naturally somewhat sketchy.

Now that I had made Mendelssohn's acquaintance, I was constantly on the watch for news of him from the many artists who came from Berlin to Frankfort, and they were never tired of singing his praises. But it was not till some years later that his abilities made a full and permanent impression on me. The "Cecilia" Society was then in all its freshness and vigor, under the admirable direction of Schellba. At one of its practice meetings, in the spring of 1825, Mendelssohn happened to be present, as he was passing through Frankfort on a holiday tour, and was asked to play. We had been singing choruses from "Judas Maccabeus." He took some of the principal melodies—especially "See the Conquering Hero"—and began to extemporize on them. I hardly know which was the most wonderful—the skilful counterpoint, the flow and continuity of the thoughts, or the fire, expression, and extraordinary execution which characterized his playing. He must have been very full of Handel at that time, for the figures which he used were thoroughly Handelian, and the power and clearness of his passages in thirds, sixths, and octaves, were really grand; and yet it all belonged to the subject-matter, with no pretension to display, and was thoroughly true, genuine, living music. It quite carried me away, and though I often heard him afterward, I do not think I ever received such an overpowering impression from his playing as I did on that occasion, when he was but a boy of sixteen. The next day, while still full of what I had heard, I met another pupil of Schmitt's, a lad of about twenty, long since dead. We talked about Mendelssohn, and he asked me how long I thought it would take to be able to do all that. I laughed. He thought that with two years' extra hard work it might be done. It was the first, though by no means the last, time that I came face to face with anyone so foolish as to think that genius can be got by practice.

His opinions on art and artists at that time, though full of the vivacity natural to his age, had yet in them something—what shall I call it?—over-ripe and almost dogmatic, which as he grew up not only became balanced, but entirely disappeared. We drove over one afternoon to see Andre at Offenbach. On the way I told him that it was probable I should be sent to Weimar, to continue my studies under Hummel. With this he found no fault, but I remember that he spoke of Hummel very much in the condescending sort of tone in which Zelter, in his letters to Goethe, expresses himself about God and the world. And when we got to Andre’s I was struck with a certain precocious positiveness in his language, though all he said was full of the most genuine enthusiasm. Andre—one of the liveliest, brightest, and best informed of musicians, who retained his inexhaustible freshness to the end of a long life—retorted very sharply, though good-naturedly. Andre was one of those musicians who are completely wrapped up in Mozart, and who measure everything by the standard of Mozart’s beauty and finish—a standard sufficient to condemn many of the finest things. Spohr’s “Jessonda” and Weber’s “Freischütz” were just then making their triumphant round of the theaters, and Andre had much to say against them. Mendelssohn, who knew by heart what the other could only allude to, agreed with him in some things, and differed in others, but was most enthusiastic about the instrumentation. “How the orchestra is treated! and what a sound it has!” cried he. The tone of voice in which he uttered this kind of thing still rings in my ear; but I am convinced that such utterances were more the result of a natural endeavor to imitate one’s pet masters, than the real expression of his nature, which was always intensely modest. The discussion even got as far as Beethoven, whom Andre had often visited in Vienna. The worst thing he could find against him was his manner (so to speak) of composing, into which this learned theorist had had a glimpse. For instance, he told us he had seen the manuscript of the A major Symphony, and that there were whole sheets left blank in it, the pages before and after which had no connection with each other. Beethoven had told him that these blanks would be filled up—but "what continuity could there be in music so composed?" This Mendelssohn would not admit in the least, and kept on playing whole movements and bits of movements in his powerful orchestral style, till Andler was in such delight that he was obliged, for the moment, to stop his criticisms. Indeed, who could think of carping or cavilling after hearing Felix play the Allegretto of the A major Symphony?

A leaf from an album, containing a three-part canon, and dated "Ehrenbreitstein Valley, September 27, 1847," gives me the clue to my next meeting with Mendelssohn. During the interval I had been with Hummel, at Weimar, and had made a journey with him to Vienna, where I had published my "Opus I," a pianoforte quartet. I was now again at work at home. I was looking into the court, this time by chance, just as a young man crossed it, whom I did not recognize, in a tall shawl hat. It turned out to be Mendelssohn, but apparently much altered in his looks. His figure had become broad and full, and there was a general air of smartness about him, with none of that careless ease which he sometimes adopted in later life. He was traveling with two of his fellow-students to Honenheim, near Coblenz, with the view of spending part of the holidays at his uncle's place. He stayed only a short time at Frankfort, but long enough for me to see that since our last meeting he had grown into a man.

We were living with Schelble; and I embrace this opportunity to speak of that distinguished man and musician, more especially as he was one of the first to recognize Mendelssohn's worth, and to devote all his influence to forwarding his music. Schelble was a thoroughly cultivated musician, remarkable as a pianist for his earnest and intelligent rendering of classical works; his voice was a splendid baritone-tenor, which he had cultivated in the same spirit as his pianoforte playing, and he had formerly been on the stage in Vienna and Frankfort. His great musical abilities had brought him into contact with the best artists; he had had much intercourse with Beethoven, and was very intimate with Spohr. In spite, however, of the success which his singing had met with on the stage, he never felt at ease there—in fact, he seems to have had no talent for acting. Looking at his fine, noble, expressive, but usually serious countenance, and somewhat stiff bearing, one might have taken him for a scholar or a Protestant pastor, but certainly not for an opera-singer. When, as a boy, I was first introduced to him, he had long given up the theater, had obtained a first-rate position as teacher in Frankfort, and out of small beginnings had established his most important work, the "Cecilia" Society. Perhaps no one ever possessed the qualities and ability necessary for conducting a choral society to such a degree as Schelle. A pianist and a singer, eloquent and impressive, inspired for his work, respected by the men, adored by the women, uniting the greatest intelligence with the most delicate ear and the purest taste, his influence was equally great as a man and a musician. His oratorio performances, as long as they were accompanied by the pianoforte (the orchestra interferes too much with the voices), were among the best that have ever taken place. His spirit still pervades the Society; for many years it was conducted on the same principles by his pupil Messer; and at present Carl Müller is its efficient head.

Though Schelle wrote but little, he had gone very deeply into composition. His judgment both in great and small things was extraordinarily acute, and his remarks on compositions submitted to him were as interesting as they were suggestive.

As he had introduced Felix into the society when a boy, and Felix, in his turn, had won its enthusiastic good will by his marvelous gift of improvisation, so Schelle was the first, outside of Berlin, to perform Mendelssohn's choral works. Felix went to look him up directly after his arrival in Frankfort, and I accompanied him. The first things that Mendelssohn played to us were some of Moscheles' studies. They were not recently published, and Felix spoke of them with great warmth, and played several by heart with extraordinary energy and evident delight. But we wanted to hear something new of his own; and great was our astonishment when he played, in the most lovely, tender, charming style, his string quartet in A minor, which he had just completed. The impression it made on us gave him all the more pleasure, as the bent of this piece had not been appreciated among his own circle, and he had a feeling of isolation in consequence. And then he played the "Midsummer Night's Dream Overture!" He had told me privately how long and with what delight he had been working at it—how in his spare time between the lectures at the Berlin University he had gone on extemporizing at it on the piano of a beautiful lady who lived close by. "For a whole year I hardly did anything else," he said; and certainly he had not wasted his time.

Of the failure of "Camacho's Wedding," his opera which had been produced at Berlin in the previous spring, he spoke with a mixture of fun and half-subdued vexation. He took off, for my benefit, whole dialogues between various people concerned in it, trying to give them a dramatic effect—with how much truth I do not know, but anyhow, in the most amusing and life-like manner. But I need hardly put down my own poor and uncertain recollections of these communications, since Edward Devrient, who was so closely connected with the whole thing both as a friend and an artist, has given us a detailed account of this entire episode in Mendelssohn's life.

Felix invited me to accompany him and his friends at least as far as Bingen, and my parents gladly gave their consent to this little excursion. At Maniz, where we stayed the night, a small boat was hired (it was still the ante-steamboat time) and stocked with all manner of eatables and drinkables, and we floated down the glorious river in great spirits. We talked, and laughed, and admired everything; and as a specimen of the sort of jokes we indulged in, I remember Mendelssohn suddenly asking one of us, "Do you know the Hebrew for snuffers?" When the "Mausethurm" came in sight, and I said that my leave was at an end, and that I must be landed at Rüdesheim, they would not hear of my going, and I only too easily let myself be persuaded to remain. But my companions got out at Horchheim, and in the evening I found myself alone at Coblenz, in rather an uncomfortable position. The recollections of the journey home rise up so vividly before me, that my reader must kindly pardon me if I try to revive them here, more for my own satisfaction than for his.

My small store of money was very much on the decline—even in the boat I had had a vague suspension of it—but on no account would I have borrowed from my fellow-travellers. Giving up all idea of supper I went to the Post, and after I had paid for a place in the coach to Bingen, found I had still twelve consolatory kreuzers (about 4d.) Early in the morning I got to Bingen, and proceeded to the river-bank, which still looked quite deserted; but the sun was rising, and it was beautifully cool and still. After a time a boatman came up half asleep and asked whether I wanted to go across. "If you will put me over to Rüdesheim," I said, "then may Heaven reward you, for I can't give you more than six kreuzers." The man had a feeling heart in his breast, and probably thought that something was better than nothing, so he very cheerfully took me over to the other side. It was a glorious morning; my spirits rose, and I began my wandering through the lovely Rheingau with a glad heart. My last six kreuzers I spent in bread and pears to keep me alive; but I had thought of a haven, into which, literally speaking, I hoped to run, and where I trusted, my wants would be at an end. At Biebeich, then the capital of the Duchy of Nassau, lived the Court-Capellmeister Rummel, whom I knew. He was a good-natured man, and a clever composer, who rather abused his facility of producing; however, he must have had his admirers, for at every Frankfort fair his name was to be seen paraded in the music shop of the famous Schott & Co. How often, and how obviously, had I stood as a boy in front of the shop, and read the many titles of his compositions! It was about ten in the morning when I entered his room, and received a hearty welcome. After the first greetings I went to the piano, and asked him to show me his latest compositions, which he gladly did. I played a Sonata, another Sonata, a Fantasia, a Rondo, Variations—and always went on begging for more, till the maid came in with a steaming soup-tureen. "Won't you stay and dine?" said the Kapellmeister, rather, as it seemed to me in my anxiety, as if he were driven to it. "Gladly," I answered, once more breathing freely—I was saved! After dinner he kindly accompanied me to Castel, and, as he knew all about the local arrangements, took a place for me, in a kind of stage called a kauder, to Frankfort. I got home safe, the coachman was paid, I recounted my adventures, showed Mendelssohn's album-leaf, and all was well. O, the happy days of youth!
CHAPTER II.

Mendelssohn's published letters show how variously he was affected by his visit to the French capital—at that time the capital of Europe. What happened to him elsewhere, when in contact with persons, performances, and circumstances against which he had a prejudice, and from which he would have preferred keeping himself at a distance, happened here also—after some resistance, he was taken possession of by them.

The few years which followed the Revolution of July are among the best in modern French history. The impression of the "Three days" was still fresh in people's minds; everything had received a new impetus, and literature and the arts especially were full of a wonderfully stirring and exuberant life. As to our beloved music, one could hardly wish for a better state of things. The Conservatoire concerts, under Habeneck, were in all their freshness; and Beethoven's Symphonies were played with a perfection, and received with an enthusiasm, which, with few exceptions, I have never since experienced. Cherubini was writing his Masses for the Chapel in the Tuileries; at the Grand Opera, Meyerbeer was beginning his series of triumphs with "Robert the Devil;" Rossini was writing "William Tell;" Scribe and Auber were at the height of their activity, and all the best singers were collected at the Italian Opera. Artists of all degrees of distinction lived in Paris, or came there to win Parisian laurels.

Ballot, though advancing in years, still played with all the fire and poetry of youth; Fagani had given a series of twelve concerts at the Grand Opera; Kalkbrenner, with his brilliant execution, represented the Clementi school; Chopin had established himself in Paris a few months before Mendelssohn's arrival; and Litol, still inspired by the tremendous impetus he had received from Mendelssohn.

Paganini, though seldom heard in public, did the most extraordinary things. German chamber music was not so much in vogue as it afterward became, but still Baillot's quartet party had its fanatical supporters, and in many German and French houses the most serious music was affectionately cultivated, and good players were welcomed with delight. Under such circumstances, it may easily be imagined how warmly Mendelssohn was greeted in the best musical circles.

The first thing that I remember connected with his arrival is "Walspurgisnacht." I still see before me the small, close, delicately written score, as he brought it from Italy. I had it in my room for a long time, and was as delighted with it at the first reading as I have always been since. So strongly did it impress itself upon me, that the music was still perfectly familiar to me sixteen or seventeen years after, when I heard it and conducted it for the first time. Another piece which he played us was the "Song without Words," in E (Book I, No. 1). He had written it in Switzerland, and evidently felt impatient that his friends should hear it; for, immediately after his arrival, he played it to Dr. Franck and myself, calling it by its newly invented name, so often misused since. Pieces of music, which one has learnt to know shortly after their composition, and which afterward have a great popularity, are like people whom one knew as children before they became famous, and one retains through life a kind of fatherly, or at any rate godfatherly, feeling for them.

The first time I heard Mendelssohn in his fullness was one evening at the house of the Leo-Valentinis, in Beethoven's D major trio. It was a peculiarity of his, that when he played new things of his own to intimate friends, he always did it with a certain reticence, which was evidently founded on the feeling of not allowing his playing to increase the impression made by the actual work itself. It was only in orchestral works, where his attention was fully occupied, that he allowed himself to be carried away. But in the music of the great masters he was always fire and glow. I heard him ofteneast, and at his best, that winter at Baillot's house, and at that of an old and much respected lady, Madame Kiéné, whose daughter, Madame Bigot (then dead), had given Felix a few music lessons when he was quite young. With Baillot he played Bach and Beethoven sonatas, Mozart concertos, with quartet accompaniments, and splendid extempore cadenzas; also his own piano-forte quartet in E minor, and other things. Baillot’s circle was small, but thoroughly musical and cultivated, and everything was listened to with a sort of pious devotion. Mendelssohn had brought with him to Paris the draft—score of the “Hebrides” overture. He told me that not only had its form and color been suggested to him by the sight of Fingal’s Cave, but that the first few bars, containing the principal subject, had actually occurred to him on the spot. The same evening, he and Klingemann paid a visit at the house of a Scotch family. There was a piano in the drawing-room, but being Sunday, music was utterly out of the question, and Mendelssohn had to employ all his diplomacy to get the instrument opened for a single minute, so that he and Klingemann might hear the theme which forms the germ of that original and masterly overture, which, however, was not completed till some years later at Düsseldorf.

Among the Parisian musicians, Habeneck took a deep interest in the gifted youth, and many of the admirable players of his orchestra were devoted to him, especially the younger ones, many of them friends of my own, whom he was always glad to see, and who chanced to him with all the warm feeling of Frenchmen. Amongst them I ought especially to mention Franchomme, the violoncello player, and Cuvillon and Sauzay, violin-players and pupils of Baillot—the latter afterward his son-in-law.

“C'est bon Mendelssohn,” they used to say; “quel talent, quelle fête, quelle organisation!” Cuvillon poured out his whole heart to him, and Felix was quite touched when he told me of his confidences one evening—how he had come to Paris full of enthusiasm for Baillot, to have lessons from him, and had fancied that such a man must live like a prince; how he had pictured to himself his establishment and all his way of life; and then to find this king of fiddlers au troisième, in almost reduced circumstances, giving lessons the whole day long, accompanying young ladies on the piano, and playing in the orchestra! It had made him quite sad, and he could not imagine the possibility of such a state of things.

It was through Habeneck and his "Société des Concerts" that Mendelssohn was introduced to the Parisian public. He played the Beethoven G major Concerto—with what success may be seen from his published letters. The "Midsummer Night's Dream Overture" was also performed and much applauded. I was present at the first rehearsal. The second oboe was missing—which might have been overcome; but just as they were going to begin, the drummer's place was also discovered to be empty. Upon which, to everybody's amusement, Mendelssohn jumped on to the orchestra, seized the drumsticks, and beat as good a roll as any drummer in the Old Guard. For the performance a place had been given him in a box on the grand tier, beside a couple of distinguished musical amateurs. During the last forte, after which the fairies return once more, one of these gentlemen said to the other: "C'est très-bien, très-bien, mais nous savons le reste;" and they slipped out without hearing the "reste," and without any idea that they had been sitting next the composer.

The termination of Mendelssohn's connection with that splendid orchestra was unpleasant, and hurt him much. His Reformation Symphony was proposed to be given, and a rehearsal took place.
I was not present, but the only account which our young friends gave me was that the work did not please the orchestra: at any rate, it was not performed. Cuvillon's description was that it was "much too learned, too much fugato, too little melody," etc., etc.
To a certain extent the composer probably came round to this opinion, for the Symphony was not published during his lifetime. But at the time I am writing of he was very fond of it, and the quiet way in which it was shelved certainly pained him. I never referred to the occurrence, and he never spoke of it to me.

A few other far more painful events took place during that Paris winter. One morning Mendelssohn came into my room in tears, and at first could find no words to tell me that his friend Edward Rietz, the violinist, was dead. Everything that he said about him, the way in which he described his ways and his playing, all showed how deeply the loss affected him. In his published correspondence, years after, I found his grief expressing itself in a higher and calmer strain, but at first it was difficult for him to control himself in the very least.

Then came the news of Goethe's death, which touched me also very deeply, though a life of such wonderful completeness should perhaps dispose one more to admiration than to regret. Mendelssohn gave me a most detailed account of his late visit to the "alter Herr," and of the sketch he had given him on the piano of the progress of modern music from Bach to Beethoven. He spoke very feelingly of the terrible loss Goethe's death would be to old Zelter, adding, "You will see, he will not long survive it." He was right—a few months later, and Zelter followed the friend who had granted him a little corner in his palace of immortality.

On the whole, as we may also see from his published letters, Mendelssohn led a pleasant easy-going life in Paris, and gave himself up to the enjoyment of the moment without hesitation. A large part of his time was devoted to chess; he was a capital player, and his usual antagonists, Michael Beer, the poet, a brother of Meyerbeer's, and Dr. Hermann Franck, only occasionally succeeded in beating him. Franck would not allow that he was inferior, and upon this Mendelssohn invented a phrase which he relentlessly repeated after every victory: "We play quite equally well—quite equally—only I play a very little better."

Of Meyerbeer, who was always a very sincere admirer of his talent, Mendelssohn saw but little. A funny little story occurred early in the visit. Mendelssohn was often told that he was very like the composer of "Robert," and at first sight his figure and general appearance did perhaps give some ground for the idea, especially as they both wore their hair in the same style. I sometimes teased Mendelssohn about it, but it seriously annoyed him, and at last one morning he appeared with his hair cut completely short. The affair excited much amusement in our set, especially when Meyerbeer heard of it; but he took it up with his usual invincible good-nature, and in the nicest way.

Chopin had been at Munich at the same time with Mendelssohn, and had given concerts there, and otherwise exhibited his remarkable abilities. When he arrived in Paris, as a complete stranger, he met with a very kind reception from Kalkbrenner, who, indeed, well deserved the highest praise as a most polished, clever, and agreeable host. Kalkbrenner fully recognized Chopin’s talent, though in rather a patronizing way. For instance, he thought his technique not sufficiently developed, and advised him to attend a class which he had formed for advanced pupils. Chopin, always soft and yielding, was unwilling to refuse outright, and went a few times to see what it was like. When Mendelssohn heard of this he was furious, for he had a great opinion of Chopin’s talent, while, on the other hand, he had been annoyed at Berlin by Kalkbrenner’s charlatanry. One evening at the Mendelssohns’ house there, Kalkbrenner played a grand Fantasia, and when Fanny asked him if it was an improvisation, he answered that it was. The next morning, however, they discovered the improvised Fantasia, published note for note under the title of “Effusio musica.” That Chopin, therefore, should submit to pass for a pupil of Kalkbrenner’s seemed to Mendelssohn, and with justice, to be a perfect absurdity, and he freely expressed his opinion on the matter. Meanwhile, the thing very soon came to its natural conclusion. Chopin gave a soirée at the Pleyel rooms; all the musical celebrities were there; he played his E minor Concerto, some of his Mazurkas and Nocturnes, and took everybody by storm. After which no more was heard of any want of technique, and Mendelssohn had his triumph.

The relations between Kalkbrenner and Mendelssohn were always somewhat insecure, but Kalkbrenner’s advances were such that Mendelssohn could not altogether decline them. We dined there together a few times, and everything went quite smoothly, though, in spite of all entreaties, Felix could never be persuaded to touch the keys of Kalkbrenner's piano. Indeed, we were none of us very grateful for Kalkbrenner's civilities, and took a wicked pleasure in worrying him. I remember that one day, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Liszt, and I had established ourselves in front of a café on the Boulevard des Italiens, at a season and an hour when our presence there was very exceptional. Suddenly we saw Kalkbrenner coming along. It was his great ambition always to represent the perfect gentleman, and knowing how extremely disagreeable it would be to him to meet such a noisy company, we surrounded him in the friendliest manner, and assailed him with such a volley of talk that he was nearly driven to despair, which of course delighted us. Youth has no mercy.

I must here tell a little story—if indeed it deserves the name—to show what mad spirits Mendelssohn was capable of at that time. We were coming home across the deserted boulevard at a late hour, in earnest conversation, when Mendelssohn suddenly stops and calls out:

“We must do some of our jumps in Paris! our jumps I tell you! now for it! one!—two!—three!—” I do n’t think mine very brilliant, for I was rather taken aback by the suggestion, but I shall never forget the moment.

Soon after Mendelssohn's arrival in Paris, Dr. Franck and I were waiting for him in his room, when he came in with a beaming face and declared that he had just seen "a miracle—a real miracle;" and in answer to our questions he continued, "Well, isn’t it a miracle? I was at Erard's with Liszt, showing him the manuscript of my Concerto, and though it is hardly legible, he played it off at sight in the most perfect manner, better than anybody else could possibly play it—quite marvellously!" I confess I was not so much surprised, having long known, from experience, that Liszt played most things best the first time, because they gave him enough to do. The second time he always had to add something, for his own satisfaction.

Of Ole Bull, the violin-player, afterward so famous, I have a few recollections. He had just escaped from the theological schools, and was in Paris for the first time. His enthusiasm for music was boundless, but of his own special talent be gave no sign whatever. He was the pleasantest listener imaginable, and his views about music and musicians, expressed in very doubtful but not the less amusing German, were a real treat tous. We often invited him to dinner, and played to him endlessly. A few years later, I saw him again as the celebrated virtuoso, but the Swedish element which so delighted me at first, had become rather a mannerism.

Mendelssohn went occasionally to see Cherubini. "What an extraordinary creature he is!" said Felix to me one day. "You would fancy that a man could not be a great composer without sentiment, heart, feeling, or whatever else you like to call it; but I declare I believe Cherubini makes everything out of his head." On another occasion he told me that he had been showing him an eight-part composition, a capella (I think it was his "Tu es Petrus"), and added, "The old fellow is really too pedantic: in one place I had a suspended third in two parts, and he would n't pass it on any condition." Some years later, happening to speak of this incident, Mendelssohn said, "The old man was right after all; one ought not to write them."

Felix's wonderful musical memory was a great source of enjoyment to us all as well as to himself. It was not learning by heart, so much as retention—and to what an extent! When we were together, a small party of musical people, and the conversation flagged, he would sit down to the piano, play some out-of-the-way piece, and make us guess the composer. On one occasion he played us an air from Haydn's "Seasons;" "The traveller stands perplexed, Uncertain and forlorn," in which not a note of the elaborate violin accompaniment was wanting. It sounded like a regular pianoforte piece, and we stood there a long time "uncertain and forlorn." The Abbe Bardin, a great musical amateur, used to get together a number of musicians and amateurs at his house once a week in the afternoons, and a great deal of music was got through very seriously and thoroughly even without rehearsals. I had just played the Beethoven E flat Concerto in public, and they asked for it again on one of these afternoons. The parts were all there, and the string quartet too, but no players for the wind. "I will do the wind," said Mendelssohn, and sitting down to a small piano which stood near the grand one, he filled in the wind parts from memory, so completely, that I don't believe a note even of the second horn was wanting. And he did it all as simply and naturally as if it were nothing.

It was a famous time. When we had no engagements we generally met in the afternoons. We willingly gave up lunch so as not to have to go out in the mornings, but a little before dinner we used to get so frightfully hungry that a visit to the confectioner was absolutely necessary. I believe we fasted simply to get an excuse for indulging this passion. In the evening we often went to the theater—oftenest to the Gymnase Dramatique, for which Scribe at that time wrote almost exclusively, and where a charming actress, Leontine Fay, had completely taken possession of us. She acted in Scribe's plays the parts of the young wives who get into doubtful situations, which call into play all their grace and common sense. She was a slender brunette with wonderful dark eyes, indescribably graceful in her movements, and a voice that went straight to your heart. The celebrated Taglioni, the first to make that great name famous through the world, was also one of our favorites. No one ever made me feel the poetry of dancing and pantomime as she did; it is impossible to imagine anything more beautiful and touching than her performance of the Sylphide. Borns says of her somewhere, "She flutters around herself, and is at once the butterfly and the flower," but this pretty picture conveys only a part of her charms.

I had written a pianoforte Concerto not long before, and played it in public, but the last movement did not please me, and having to play it again during this Mendelssohn winter, I determined to write a new Finale, which I secretly intended should be a picture of Leontine Fay. I had begun it, but the concert was to come off so soon that Mendelssohn declared I should not get my work done in time. This of course I denied, so we made a bet of a supper upon it. My friend's opposition excited me to make a real trial of skill, and I scored the orchestral part of the whole movement without putting down a note of the solo part. The copyist, too, did his best, and the result was that I contrived to play the Concerto with the new Finale on the appointed day. Felix paid for the supper, and Labarre, the well-known harpist, a handsome, clever, and amusing fellow, was invited to join us. How far the portrait of Leonine Fay was successful, I leave to be decided by its own merits, though Felix confessed that it was not unlike her.

In the midst of all these distractions, Mendelssohn made use of every quiet hour for work, much of which was a complete contrast to his actual life at the time. It consisted generally of putting the last touches to former pieces, such as church music, his string Quintet in A, etc. Of quite new music he did not write much to speak of during those months, but still I remember his playing me some new songs, and short pianoforte pieces. I had just completed my first three Trios, and the very warm and friendly interest which he took in my work was often a great help to me. When he liked a thing he liked it with his whole heart, but if it did not please him, he would sometimes say and do the most singular things. One day when I had been playing him some composition of mine, long since destroyed, he threw himself down on the floor and rolled about all over the room. Happily there was a carpet! Many an evening we spent quite quietly together talking about art and artists over the cheerful blazing fire. On great things we always agreed, but our views on Italian and French composers differed considerably, I being a stronger partisan for them than he. He sometimes did not spare even the masters whom he thought most highly of. He once said of Handel that one might imagine he had had his different musical drawers, one for his warlike, another for his heathen, and a third for his religious choruses.

Speaking of the operas in general he said that he thought it had not yet produced so perfect and complete a masterpiece as "Wil-ian Tell" and others of Schiller's dramas, but that it must be capable of things equally great, whoever might accomplish them. Though fully alive to the weak points in Weber's music, he had a very strong and almost personal feeling for him. When Weber came to Berlin to conduct the performance of "Freischutz," Mendelssohn declared that he did not dare to approach him, and that once when Weber was driving to the Mendelssohns' after a rehearsal, and wanted to take Felix with him, he obstinately refused the honor, and then ran home by a short cut at such a pace as to be ready to open the door for the Herr Hof-Capellmeister on his arrival. Of all Mozart's works, I think the "Magic Flute" was the one he liked best. It seemed to him so inexpressibly wonderful, that with such perfectly artistic consciousness, and the simplest means, it was possible to express exactly what one wanted, neither more nor less, and with such beauty and completeness.

I was unfortunately obliged to leave Paris a few weeks before Mendelssohn, as my parents wanted me at home. He and some other young friends came to the well-known post-house in the Rue J. J. Rousseau to see me off. "I really envy you," he cried, "going off to Germany for the spring; it's the best thing in the world!" After my departure, during the latter part of his stay in Paris, he had an attack of cholera, but, fortunately, not severe. From Paris he went to London, and never returned to the French capital.
CHAPTER III.

Aix-la-Chapelle and Dusseldorf, May, 1834.

FELIX MENDELSSOHN TO HIS MOTHER.

"DUSSELDORF, the 23rd of May, 1834.

"A week ago today I drove to Aix-la-Chapelle with the two Woodenens; an order from the cabinet, five days before the festival, had given permission for it to be held at Whitsuntide, and this order was so worded as to render it very probable that the permission would be extended to future years. It took us eleven hours' posting, and I was fearfully bored, and arrived cross. We went straight to the rehearsal, and I heard a few numbers of "Deborah," sitting in the stalls; then I told Woodenen that I must write at once to Hiller from there, the first time for two years, because he had done his task so well. Really his work was so modest, and sounded so well, though all the time quite subordinate to Handel, without cutting anything out, and it delighted me to find some one thinking as I do, and doing just as I should. I noticed a man with a moustache, in the front row of boxes, reading the score, and after the rehearsal, as he came down into the theater and I went up, we met behind the scenes, and sure enough it was Ferdinand Hiller, who tumbled into my arms, ready to squeeze me to death for joy. He had come from Paris to hear the oratorio, and Chopin had cut his lessons to come with him, and so we met once more. I could now thoroughly enjoy the festival, for we three stayed together, and got a box for ourselves in the theater where the performances were held; and the next morning of course we were all at the piano, and that was a great delight to me. They have both improved in execution, and as a pianoforte player Chopin is now one of the very first; quite a second Paganini, doing entirely new things, and all sorts of impossibilities which one never thought could be done. Hiller is also a capital player, with plenty of power, and knows how to please. They both labor a little under the Parisian love for effect and strong contrasts, and often sadly lose sight of time and calmness and real musical feeling; perhaps I go too far the other way, so we mutually supply our deficiencies, and all three learn from each other, I think; meanwhile I felt rather like a schoolmaster, and they seemed rather like miscellaneous or in-crocheted. After the festival we traveled together to Dusseldorf, and had a very pleasant day with music and talk; yesterday I accompanied them to Cologne, and this morning they went up to Coblenz by steamer—I came down again, and the charming episode was at an end."

In the interest of my readers, I should hardly be able to add anything to this delightful letter. But I can not resist the temptation of going over this "charming episode" once more, pen in hand, recapitulating and dwelling on it, even where it does not especially concern the friend to whom these pages are consecrated.

In the summer of 1833 I was living in my mother's house in Frankfort, having lost my father in the spring; I was then very much taken up with Handel's oratorios, the scores of which had been kindly put at my disposal by Ferdinand Ries. "Deborah" I had not seen before, and it so pleased me that I began translating it into German, without any definite purpose, though I happened to tell Ries what I was doing. On my return to Paris with my mother, in the autumn, I got a letter from Ries, asking if I felt disposed to translate "Deborah," and write additional accompaniments, for the next Lower Rhine Musical Festival. It was to be completed by the New Year. I accepted the proposal with the greatest delight, got it all done by the appointed time, and as a reward was invited to the festival. Chopin, with whom I was in daily and intimate intercourse, easily let himself be persuaded to go with me, and we were busy making our traveling plans when news arrived that the festival was not to take place at Whitsuntide, though possibly later. We had hardly reconciled ourselves to postponing our journey, when we heard that after all permission had been granted for the festival to be held at Whitsuntide. I hurried to Chopin with the news, but with a melancholy smile he answered that it was no longer in his power to go. The fact was that Chopin's purse was always open to assist his emigrant Polish countrymen; he had put aside the necessary means for the journey; but the journey having been postponed, forty-eight hours had been quite sufficient to empty his money-box. As I would not on any condition give up his company, he said, after much consideration, that he thought he could manage it, produced the manuscript of his lovely E flat waltz, ran off to Pleyel's with it, and came back with 500 francs! Who was happier then than I? The journey to Aix-la-Chapelle was most successful. I had the honor to be quartered in the house of the "Oberburgermeister," and Chopin got a room close by. We went straight to the rehearsal of "Deborah," and there, to my great surprise and delight, I met Mendelssohn, who immediately joined us. At that time they seemed not to have much idea of his greatness at Aix-la-Chapelle, and it was only twelve years later, the year before his death, that they made up their minds to confide the direction of the festival to him.

With the exception of some parts of "Deborah," my impressions of the performances are quite effaced. But I distinctly remember the day we spent together at Dusseldorf, where the Academy, recently revived by Schadow, was then in the full vigor of youth. Mendelssohn had conducted the festival there in the spring, and entered on his functions as musical director in the autumn. He had a couple of pretty rooms on the ground floor of Schadow's house, was working at "St. Paul," associated a great deal with the young painters, kept a horse, and was altogether in a flourishing condition. The whole morning we spent at his piano, playing to each other. Schadow had invited us for a walk in the afternoon. The general appearance and tone of the company in which we found ourselves made an impression on me that I shall never forget. It was like a prophet with his disciples—Schadow, with his noble head, his manner at once dignified and easy, and his eloquent talk, surrounded by a number of young men, many of them remarkably handsome, and most of them already great artists, who nevertheless listened to him in humble silence, and seemed to think it perfectly natural to be lectured by him. It had become so completely a second nature to Schadow, even outside the studio, to act the master, animating and encouraging, or even severely lecturing, that when Felix announced his intention of accompanying us to Cologne on the following day, he asked him in a serious tone what would become of "St. Paul" with all these excursions and distractions. Mendelssohn answered quietly, but firmly, that it would all be ready in good time. We ended the walk with coffee and a game at bowls; and Felix, who had been on horseback, lent me his horse to ride home on. Chopin was a stranger to them all, and with his usual extreme reserve had kept close to me during the walk, watching everything, and making his observations to me in the softest of voices. Schadow, always hospitable, asked us to come again in the evening, and we then found some of the most rising young painters there. The conversation soon became very animated, and all would have been right if poor Chopin had not sat there so silent and neglected. However, Mendelssohn and I knew that he would have his revenge, and secretly rejoiced at the thought. At last the piano was opened; I began, Mendelssohn followed; then we asked Chopin to play, and rather doubtful looks were cast at him and us. But he had hardly played a few bars, before everybody in the room, especially Schadow, was transfixed—nothing like it had ever been heard. They were all in the greatest delight, and begged for more and more. Count Almaviva had dropped his disguise, and every one was dumb.

The next day Felix accompanied us on the steamer to Cologne, where we arrived late in the afternoon. He took us to see the Apostle's Church, and then to the Bridge, where we parted in rather a comic way. I was looking down into the river, and made some extravagant remark or other, upon which Mendelssohn calls out: "Hiller getting sentimental; heaven help us! Adieu, farewell"—and he was gone.

A year afterward I got the following letter:

"DUSSELDORF, February 26, 1835.

"DEAR HILLER:—I want to ask you a favour. No doubt you will think it very wrong of me to begin my first letter in this way, and not to have written you long since of my own accord. I think so myself; but when you consider that I am the worst correspondent in the world, and also the most overworked man (Louis Philippe perhaps excepted), you will surely excuse me. So pray listen to the following request, and think of happier times, and then you will fulfill it.

"You will remember from last year how the second day at the musical festivals is generally arranged. A symphony, an overture, and two or three large pieces for chorus and orchestra, something of the style and length of Mozart's 'David de Penitente,' or even shorter and more lively, or with quite secular words, or only one long piece—such as Beethoven's 'Merry Stille,' for instance. I am to conduct the Cologne Festival this time, and I want to know whether Cherubini has written anything that would do for the second day's performance, and whether, if in manuscript, he would let me have it. You told me that you were on very good terms with him, and I am sure you can get me the best information on the point. If printed, pray say what you think of it, and give me the full title, that I may send for it. The words may be Latin, Italian, or French, and the contents, as I said before, sacred or otherwise. The chief condition is merely that it should employ both chorus and orchestra; and if it were a piece of some length, say half an hour, I should like it to be in several movements; or, if there is no long piece, I should even like a single short one. It appears that he wrote a number of grand hymns for the Revolution, which ought to be very fine—might not one of these do? It is impossible to see anything of that kind here, while it would only take you a couple of hours or a walk or two; so I am convinced you can do what I ask, especially as you are intimate with Cherubini, and he will therefore tell you directly what he has written in this line, and where it is to be found.

"It would of course be best if we could get hold of something quite unknown to musicians. You may imagine how glad the whole committee, and all the company of Oberbürgermeisters, and the entire town of Cologne, and all the rest, would be to write to Cherubini to make this application. And of course they would also willingly be charged something for it; but, with his strange ways, they might catch him in an evil hour, and probably he does not care much about it, therefore it is better for you to undertake the matter, and write to me what is to be done next. All that I want is to have nothing but really fine music on the second day, and that is why this request is important to me, and why I count on your fulfilling it.

"Then I shall at the same time hear how life goes with you on your railway. Sometimes I hear about it through the "Messenger or the "Constitutionnel," when you give a Soirée, or play Bach's Sonatas with Baillot; but it is always very short and fragmentary. I want to know if you have any regular and continuous occupation, whether you have been composing much, and what, and if you are coming back to Germany. So you see I am the same as ever.

"My oratorio will be quite ready in a few weeks, and I hear from Schelkle that it is to be performed by the Cecilia Society in October. I have some new pianoforte things, and shall shortly publish some of them. I always think of you and your wariness whenever an old-fashioned passage comes into my head, and hope to get rid of such ideas. You will of course conclude from this that I often think of you, but that you might believe anyhow. My three overtures are not cut yet; Hartel writes to me today that they are at the binder's, and will be here in a few days. I shall send you a copy as I promised at the first opportunity, and as soon as my new symphony comes out, you shall have that too. I will gladly release you from your promise of sending me those plaster caricatures in return, and ask you instead to let me have some copies of new compositions—which I should like a great deal better. Remember me to Chopinette, and let me know what new things he has been doing; tell him that the military band here serenaded me on my birthday, and that amongst other things they played his E flat Mazurka with trombones and big drum; the part in G flat with two bassoons was enough to kill one with laughing. A preces, the other day I saw Berlioz's Symphony, arranged by Liszt, and played it through, and once more could not imagine how you can see anything in it. I can not conceive anything more insipid, wearisome, and Philistine, for with all his endeavors to go stark mad, he never once succeeds; and as to your Liszt with his two fingers on one key, what does a poor provincial like me want with him? What is the good of it all? But still it must be nicer in Paris than here, even if it were only for Frau v. S (Frau v. M.'s sister), who is really too pretty, and is now in Paris (here there's not a soul that's pretty). And then there's plenty of agreeable society (remember me to Cuvillon, Sauzay, and Liszt, also to Baillot a thousand times; but not to Herr — nor Madame — nor the child; and tell Chopin to remember me to Eichthal), and it's always so amusing there—but still I wish you would come to Germany again.

"But I have gossiped long enough. Mind you answer very soon, as soon as you can tell me what I want to know, and remember me to your mother, and keep well and happy.

"Your

"Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy."

"Dusseldorf, March 14, 1835.

"Dear Hiller:—Many thanks for your dear kind letter, which gave me very great pleasure. It’s not right of you to say that I should be obliged on account of the business to write to you again, because I should have done so at any rate; and if you want to try, you had better answer this very soon, and then you will see how I shall write again. I should so like to know all about your life, and what you do, and be able to picture it to myself thoroughly. About my own I have not much to say, but there is no thought of my leaving Germany and going to England; who can have told you such a thing? Whether I stay at Düsseldorf longer than I am bound by my contract, which comes to an end next October, is another question; for there is simply nothing to be done here in the way of music, and I long for a better orchestra, and shall probably accept another offer that I have had. I wanted to be quite free again for a few years, and go on a sort of art journey, and snap my fingers at musical directorships and the like, but my father does not wish it, and in this I follow him unconditionally. You know that from the very beginning all I wanted was to get real quiet here for writing some larger works, which will be finished by then; and so I hope to have made use of my stay. Besides it is very pleasant, for the painters are capital good people, and lead a jolly life; and there is plenty of taste and feeling for music here; only the means are so limited that it is unprofitable in the long run, and all one’s trouble goes for nothing. I assure you that at the best, they all come in separately, not one with any firmness, and in the pianoes the flute is always too loud, and not a single Düsseldorfer can play a triplet clearly, but a quaver and two semiquavers instead, and every Allegro leaves off twice as fast as it began, and the oboe plays E natural in C minor, and they all carry their fiddles under their coats when it rains, and when it is fine they don’t cover them at all—and if you once heard me conduct this orchestra, not even four horses could bring you there a second time. And yet there is a musician or two among them, who would do credit to any orchestra, even to your Conservatoire; but that is just the misery in Germany; the bass trombones and the drum and the double bass are capital, and all the others quite abominable. There is also a choral society of one hundred and twenty members, which I have to coach once a week, and they sing Handel very well and correctly, and in the winter there are six subscription concerts, and in the summer every month a couple of masses, and all the dilettante fight each other to the death, and nobody will sing the solos, or rather everybody wants to, and they hate putting themselves forward, though they are always doing it—but you know what music is in a small German town—Heaven help us! This is certainly rather an odd way of coming back to the question of your returning to Germany. But still the very agreeable and telling way in which you refused my dinner-invitation does not yet repel me. On the contrary, I should like you for once to answer the question seriously: Is there any condition on which you would like to live in Germany? and if so, what? As we said in front of the Post-house at Aix-la-Chapelle, we shall never get far in the matter with theoretical discussions. But now I should like to know whether, if for instance a place like Hummel's, or like Spohr's at Cassel, or Grund's at Meiningen, in short any 'Capell-meisters' place at one of the small courts were vacant, you would accept such a thing, and allow it to determine you to leave Paris?
Would the pecuniary advantages be of any great importance to you? or are you not thinking of coming back in any case? or are you too much tied by the attractions and excitements of your present life? Pray don't be vexed with me for all these questions, and answer them as fully as you can. It is always possible that such a place may turn up in Germany, and you can imagine how I should like to have you nearer, both for my own sake and the sake of good music,

"And now to business; and first I must thank you very much for the prompt and satisfactory way in which you have managed it for us. I should like it best if you would send me the Motett in E flat 'late die,' with the 'Tantum ergo' for five voices, and at the same time also the Coronation March from the Mass du Sacre. That is what I want.

"A Herr von Beck from Cologne will call on you, and ask for these things. Please let him have them to send to me, and tell him what you have spent, and he will reimburse you—and again many thanks to you. I have not yet received your studies and songs from Frankfort, but on the other hand the Reveries are lying on my piano, because an acquaintance of mine gets the French paper and always sends it to me whenever there is anything of yours or Chopin's in it. The one in F sharp major is my favorite and pleases me very much, and the A flat one is quaint and charming. But do tell me exactly what you have been doing and are going to do. I see from what you say that you are proposing some great work, but you don't tell me what it is.

"Yours,"
"F. M. B.

"Benedemann, Schirmer, and Hildebrand all beg to be remembered to you, and hope that you will soon be here again."

At the end of 1847, when I came to Düsseldorf as director, I found the music there on quite a different footing from that which Mendelssohn had described. The twelve years' energy which Edward Rietz had devoted to it had not been in vain. When I removed to Cologne in 1850, I managed to secure the post for Robert Schumann.
CHAPTER IV.

Frankfort. (Summer of 1836.)

My dear mother had given up living in Paris, so as to leave me free for a journey to Italy, which I had long wished to undertake. We returned to Frankfort in the spring of 1836, and immediately after our arrival I hurried off to Düsseldorf. The Lower Rhenish Musical Festival was to take place there that year under Mendelssohn's direction, and "St. Paul" was to be performed for the first time. The room in the Becker-garden (now the so-called "Ritteresaal" belonging to the town music-hall) was too small for the large audience and orchestra, and in the "Sleepers wake" chorus, the blast of the trumpets and trombones down from the gallery into the low hall was quite overpowering. I had arrived too late for rehearsal, and, sitting there all alone, listening to an entirely new work, in a frightfully hot and close room, was naturally not so deeply impressed as I expected to be. But the audience, who had already heard it three or four times, were delighted; the performers were thoroughly inspired; and on the third day, when, among other things, the chorus "Rise up, arise," was repeated, I listened with very different ears, and was as enthusiastic as anybody. The oratorio afterward grew on me more and more, especially the first part, which I now consider one of the noblest and finest of Mendelssohn's works.

Mendelssohn was in every way the center-point of the festival, not only as composer, director, and pianist, but also as a lively and agreeable host, introducing people to each other, and bringing the right people together, with a kind word for everybody. There I saw Sterndale Bennett for the first time, renewed my boyish friendship with Ferdinand David, and greatly enjoyed meeting the young painters of Schadow's school, many of them already famous. The only musical part of the festival which I remember, besides "St.
Paul,” was Mendelssohn’s and David’s performance of the Kreutzer Sonata, which they played with extraordinary spirit and absolute unity.

A few days after my return, Felix followed me to Frankfort. The first thing which he encountered there was a report of the festival (the first that he had seen), in which “St. Paul” was spoken of in that lofty, patronizing, damaging tone so often adopted by critics toward artists who stand high above them. It was some time before he could get over the fact that the first criticism of his beloved work should be so offensive—so that the writer had gained his object. Our excellent friend Scheible had been obliged, by illness, to retire to his home at Hüningen, in Baden, and Mendelssohn had promised meanwhile to undertake the direction of the “Casilina” Society for him. He took it only for six weeks, but during that short time his influence was most inspiring. He made them sing Handel and Bach, especially the wonderfully beautiful cantata by the latter, “Gottese Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit.” He knew how to communicate his own enthusiasm to the chorus, and completely electrified them. At the same time he won all hearts by his invariable good nature and kindness in every act and word.

Mendelssohn was living in a fine house belonging to Scheible, which stood at the corner of the Schöne Aussicht, with a splendid view up and down the river. It was a pleasant place, and he enjoyed receiving his friends there, and loved an occasional interruption even in the morning, by sympathetic visitors.

Our house, at the “Parrereisen,” was not far off, and we saw a great deal of each other. My dear mother, who in spite of her intense love for me could easily be enthusiastic about talents which surpassed my own, was in raptures with Mendelssohn, and ready to do anything for him that lay in her power. She soon discovered his favorite dishes, and knew how to indulge him in so many little ways, that he felt quite at home with us. She would often secretly order a carriage for us, so that we might make excursions in the beautiful environs of Frankfort. On one of these expeditions I had the opportunity of seeing my friend in rather a passion. It was near the village of Bergen. The coachman did or said some stupidity or other, upon which Mendelssohn jumped out of the carriage in a towering rage, and after pouring a torrent of abuse upon the man, declared that nothing should make him get into the carriage again. The punishment was on our side, and my mother was quite frightened when we arrived late in the evening, hot and exhausted, having had to walk the whole way home. At supper, Felix himself could not help laughing, though still stoutly maintaining that he was right.

I remember once, directly after dinner, Mendelssohn's taking up my Studies, which lay on the piano, sitting down, and playing off the whole four-and-twenty one after the other in the most splendid style. My mother was in ecstasy. "He is a real man, that Felix," she told me, beaming with delight. He, meanwhile, was in the greatest spirits at having given us pleasure, but so hot and excited that he went off directly to my room, to the leather sofa on which he was so fond of rolling about.

We had many pleasant and interesting visitors at that time, among others the famous Swedish song-writer Lindblad, whose northern accent added a peculiar charm to his liveliness and gaiety.
His visit was short, but we saw a great deal of him. One morning, after Mendelssohn had played his overture to "Melusine," he said,
"That music actually listens to itself!" Perhaps it does—and it must be delighted with what it hears.

A special interest was given to that spring by Rossini's visit to Frankfort, and his almost daily meetings with Mendelssohn at our house. This most renowned of all Maestros had come to Frankfort with the Baroneess James Rothschild, for the wedding of one of the younger members of the family—in the Baroiness' mind no doubt to swell the glory of the feast by his presence. She was a highly cultivated lady, and knew Rossini's best side, having had plenty of opportunity, during their long journey, of observing his deep appreciation of whatever was beautiful, and his delight in art and nature. Rossini, since his "William Tell," had reached the highest pinnacle of his fame, and was at that time also at the height of his personality, if I may so express myself. He had lost the enormous corpulence of former years: his figure was full, but not disproportioned, and his splendid countenance, in which the power of the thinker and the wit of the humorist were united, beamed with health and happiness. He spoke French quite as well as Italian, and in a most melodious voice: his long residence in Paris, and intercourse with the best people there, had transformed him from a haughty young Italian into a man of the world—dignified, graceful, and charming, and enchanting everybody by his irresistible amiability. He had called on us one morning, to our great delight, and was describing his journey through Belgium, and all that had struck him there, when I heard the door-bell, and feeling certain that it was Mendelssohn, ran out to open the door of the corridor. It was Felix, and with him Julius Rietz, who had just arrived. I told them that Rossini was there, and Mendelssohn was delighted; but in spite of all our persuasions, Rietz would not come in, and went off. When Felix appeared, Rossini received him with marked respect, and yet so pleasantly, that in a few minutes the conversation resumed its flow and became quite animated. He entreated Mendelssohn to play to him, and though the latter was somewhat disinclined, they arranged to meet at our house again next morning, and these meetings were often repeated in the course of the next few days. It was quite charming to see how Felix, though inwardly resisting, was each time afresh obliged to yield to the overwhelming amiability of the Maestro, as he stood at the piano listening with the utmost interest, and expressing his satisfaction with more or less delight. I can not deny the fact—and indeed it was perfectly natural—but Felix, with his juvenile demeanor, playing his compositions to a composer whose melodies just then ruled the whole world of song, was, in a certain measure, acting an inferior part; as must always be the case when one artist introduces himself to another without any corresponding return. Mendelssohn soon began to rebel a little. "If your Rossini," said he to me one morning when we met in the stream of the Main, "goes on muttering such things as he did yesterday, I won't play him anything more." "What did he mutter?" I asked; "I did not hear anything." "But I did: when I was playing my F-sharp minor Caprice, he muttered between his teeth, 'C'est la sonate de Scarlatti.'" "Well, that's nothing so very dreadful." "Ah—bah!"

However, on the following day he played to him again. I must add that even in his later years Rossini looked back upon this meeting with Mendelssohn with heartfelt pleasure, and expressed the strongest admiration for his talent.

The impression that Rossini made on the whole colony of Frankfort musicians was really tremendous. As early as the second day after his arrival I had to drive about with him to all the artists of importance, and with many of them to act the part of interpreter. Some were ready to faint with fear and surprise when he appeared. Afterward my mother invited all these gentlemen, and one or two foreign artists who happened to be staying in Frankfort, to meet him at a soirée; and it was almost comic to see how each did his best to shine before the great leader of the light Italian school. Capellmeister Guhr played a sonata of his own, Ferdinand Ries the study with which he had first made a sensation in London, Aloys Schmitt a rondo, and some one else a nocturno. Mendelssohn was intensely amused at the whole thing. Rossini was more stately that evening than I ever remember to have seen him: very polite, very amiable, and very complimentary—in fact too complimentary. But next day his sly humor came out. A grand dinner had been arranged in his honor at the "Mainlust," and as many celebrities of all kinds as there were room for took part in it, Mendelssohn among the rest. When the dinner was over, the hero of the day began walking up and down the garden and talking in his usual way; meanwhile the place had become crowded with people who wanted to see the great man, and who pushed and squeezed and peered about to get a peep at him, he all the time pretending to ignore them utterly. I have never witnessed such a personal ovation to a composer in the open air—except, perhaps, on his way to the grave!

The year 1836 was one of the most important of Mendelssohn's life, for it was that in which he first met his future wife. Madame Jeanrenaud was the widow of a clergymen of the French Reformed Church in Frankfort. Her husband had died in the prime of life, and she was living with her children at the house of her parents, the Souchays, people of much distinction in Frankfort. Felix had been introduced to them, and soon felt himself irresistibly attracted by the beauty and grace of the eldest daughter, Cecile. His visits became more and more frequent, but he always behaved with such reserve toward his chosen one, that, as she once laughingly told me in her husband’s presence, for several weeks she did not imagine herself to be the cause of Mendelssohn’s visits, but thought he came for the sake of her mother, who, indeed, with her youthful viracity, cleverness, and refinement, chattering away in the purest Frankfort dialect, was extremely attractive. But though during this early time Felix spoke but little to Cecile, when away from her he talked of her all the more. Lying on the sofa in my room after dinner, or taking long walks in the mild summer nights with Dr. S. and myself, he would rave about her charm, her grace, and her beauty. There was nothing overstrained in him, either in his life or in his art: he would pour out his heart about her in the most charmingly frank and artless way, often full of fun and gaiety; then again, with deep feeling, but never with an exaggerated sentimentality or uncontrolled passion. It was easy to see what a serious thing it was, for one could hardly get him to talk of anything which did not touch upon her more or less. At that time I did not know Cecile, and therefore could only act the sympathetic listener. How thankless the part of confidant is, we learn from French tragedies; but I had not even the satisfaction of being sole confidant, for S. was often present during Felix’s outpourings; but, then again, we could talk over these revelations, and our affection for Mendelssohn made it easy for us to forgive the monotony which must always pervade a lover’s confidences. Mendelssohn’s courtship was no secret, and was watched with much curiosity and interest by the whole of Frankfort society; and many remarks which I heard showed me that in certain circles, to pos-scess genius, culture, fame, amiability, and fortune, and belong to a family of much consideration as well as celebrity, is hardly enough to entitle a man to raise his eyes to a girl of patrician birth. But I do not think that anything of this sort ever came to Mendelssohn’s ears.

In the beginning of August he went to the seaside for the benefit of his health, and also, as Devrient tells us, on good authority, to test his love by distance. Soon after he left, I got the following letter from the Hague; and his humorous irritation shows even more plainly than his pathetic complaints, how hard he found it to bear the few weeks’ separation.

’S GRAVENHAGE, 7th August, 1836.

DEAR HILLER:—How I wish I were at the “Pfarreisen” with you, telling you about Holland, instead of writing to you about it. I think it is impossible in Frankfort to have any idea how dull it is at the Hague.

If you don’t answer this letter directly, and write me at least eight pages about Frankfort and the “Fahrthor”;* and about you and your belongings, and music, and all the living world, I shall probably turn cheesemonger here and never come back again. Not one sensible thought has come into my head since I drove out of the Hôtel de Russie; now I am beginning by degrees to accustom myself to it a little, and have given up hoping for any sensible ideas, and only count the days till I go back, and rejoice that I have already taken my sixth bath today, about a quarter of the whole dose. If you were me, you would already have packed up ten times, turned your back on the cheese-country, said a few incomprehensible words to your traveling companion, and gone home again; I should be glad enough to do so, but a certain Philistinism that I am known to possess holds me back. I had to stay three days instead of two at Düsseldorf, because it was impossible to get 8. away, and I think those few days did a good deal toward making me melancholy. There was such an air of the past about everything, and fatal remembrance—for whom you know I care but little—would play its part again. The festival is said to have been fine, but that did not make the time any less tedious. I had to hear no end about Schindler and his writings and refutations, and it was not amusing. I dined at ——, and that also recalled bygone times.

Rietz is, for the moment, recovered, but looks so dreadfully ill and worried, and is so overworked by the musical set at Düsseldorf, and so ill-treated by others, that it made my heart ache to see him. We had rain on the steamer as far as Rotterdam; Schirmer came on here with us, and then went by steamer to Havre, and after that to Paris—but oh! I wish I were at the “Pfarreisen”—for all the real bother began here. S. got cross, and found everything too dear, and we could n’t get a lodging or a carriage, and the Dutch did not understand German, though S. boldly addressed them all in it; and his boy was naughty, and there was no end of bother. We have got a lodging at the Hague now, and drive out to Scheveningen every morning at eight, and take our bath, and are all in good working order. However, nothing can destroy the effect of the sea out at Scheveningen, and the straight green line is as mysterious and unfathomable as ever, and the fish and shells which the tide washes up onto the shore are delightful. But still the sea here is as prosaic as it can possibly be anywhere; the sandhills look dreary and hopeless, and one sees hardly any reflection in the water, because the level of the coast is so low; half the sea is just the color of the shore, because it is very shallow at first, and only begins to be deep far out. There are no big ships, only middling-sized fishing-boats; so I do n’t feel cheerful, though a Dutchman caught hold of me to-day as I was running along the shore and said, “Hier solle se nu majestuosische Idee sammele.” I thought to myself, “It’s a pity you are not in the land where the pepper grows and I in the wine-country.” One can’t even be really alone, for here, too, there are musical people, and they take offense if you snub them. There are actually some Leipzig ladies who bathe at Scheveningen and go about afterward with their hair all down their backs, which looks disgusting, and yet you’re expected to be civil to them. My only consolation is Herr von ——, which shows how far gone I am; but he also is bored to death, and that is why we harmonize. He keeps looking at the sea as if he could have it tapped to-morrow if he chose; but that does not matter, and I like better walking with him than with the Leipzig ladies with their long hair. Lastly, I have to teach S.’s boy, help him with his Latin construing from Cornelius Nepos, mend his pens, cut his bread and butter, and make tea for him every morning and evening, and to-day I had to coax him into the water, because he always screamed so with his father and was so frightened—and this is how I live at the Hague, and I wish I were at the "Pfarrei-isen."

But do write soon and tell me all about it, and comfort me a little. . . . That was a good time we had in Frankfort, and as I seldom talk of such things, I must tell you now how heartily thankful I am to you for it. Those walks at night by the Main, and many an hour at your house, and the afternoons when I lay on your sofa, and you were so frightfully bored and I not at all—I shall never forget them. It really is a great pity that we meet so seldom and for such short times; it would be such a pleasure to us both if it could be otherwise. Or do you think we should end by quarreling? I do n’t believe it.

Have you ever, since I went away, thought of our Leipsic overture which I am so fond of? Do let me find it finished when I come back; it will only take you a couple of afternoons now, and hardly anything but copying. And my piano-forte piece, how about that? I have not thought of music here yet, but I have been drawing and painting a good deal, and I may also perhaps bring back some music. What is the Cecilia Society doing? Is it alive still, or sleeping and snoring? Many things belonging to our Frankfort time are over. . . . —— told me to-day that H. is engaged to be married: is it true? Then you, too, must marry soon. I propose Madame M. Have you seen her again, and the Darmstadt lady? Write to me all about Frankfort. Tell Mdlle.
J. that there is only one engraving hanging in my room here, but it represents la ville de Toulon, and so I always have to think of her as a Toulonese. And mind you remember me to your mother most particularly, and write to me very, very soon. If my patience is not exhausted, I shall stay here till the 24th or 25th of August, and then travel by land or by water back to the free town of Frankfort.
Oh that I were there now! If you show this letter to anybody I wish you may be roasted, and anyhow I should be hanged; so lock it up or burn it, but write to me at once, poste restante a la Haye.
Farewell, and think nicely of me and write soon.

Your F. M. B.

It will easily be conceived that I did not burn this letter, and I shall hardly be blamed for not keeping it locked up any longer. A few days after I received it I met with a little accident. Jumping into the swimming-bath in the Main, at low water, I trod on a sharp Mendelssohn.

piece of glass, and must have cut a small vein, for when, with a good deal of pain, I got to land, a little fountain of blood sprang from the wound. I was more amused than frightened at the sight, but toward evening I had a kind of nervous attack, which made made me feel very weak and ill. A few days later the doctor rec-commended change of air, and sent me to Homburg, at that time a most retired and idyllic little spot. There was one small house near the mineral spring, in which my mother and I established ourselves: the whole bathing population consisted only of some two dozen Frankforters. From there I sent Mendelssohn a report of myself, and received the following answer:

The Hague, 18th August, 1836.

Dear Ferdinand:—This is very bad news which your letter gives me, and the whole tone of it is so low-spirited that it shows what a tiresome and serious illness you have gone through. I hope you are getting on better now, and that these lines will find you in quite a different frame of mind to the one you wrote to me in; but as you had to be sent to the country, the thing must have been rather obstinate, and if, with your strong constitution, you had nervous attacks, and suffered from exhaustion, it must really have been serious, and you must have needed much patience, poor fellow! I only hope that it is all over now, and that I shall find you in Frankfort again quite strong and well. It is curious that I also should have hurt my foot bathing, about eight or ten days ago (much less seriously than you, of course, only sprained), and since that time I limp about laboriously, which certainly creates a sort of sympathy between us, but only makes the stay here more tiresome; for if one can't give full play to one's body (in a twofold sense) in a bathing place like this, one really has nothing else to do. In fact, if you expect this to be a cheerful letter I am afraid you must take the will for the deed, for I am much too full of whims now that I am obliged to limp, and am no good as a comforter. Besides this, S. took himself off a few days ago, and has left me here alone amongst the people "who speak a strange tongue." Now I have to swallow all the "enani" by myself—we used, at least, to be able to swear in company. The bathing seemed to exhaust him too much, and he was afraid of getting seriously ill, so I could hardly press him to stay, and he is probably already sitting comfortably and quietly at Düsseldorf, whilst I have our whole apartment to myself, and can sleep in three beds if I like. Twenty-one baths make up what they call the small cure, the minimum that can do one any good, and when I have finished these I shall be off in a couple of hours, and I look forward to Emmerich and the Prussian frontier as if it were Naples or something equally beautiful. Next Monday I shall take this long-expected twenty-first bath, and my plan is to go up the Rhine by steamer as, unfortunately, there is no quicker way. I must stop a day at Horchheim, at my uncle's, for on the way here I hardly stopped at all; and I hope to goodness on Sunday evening, August 28th, I may celebrate Goethe's birthday at Frankfort in Rhine wine; and as I write this you can't imagine how I long for the time. Shall we be able to spend the evening together directly? I am always afraid you will stop too long at your Homburg, and who knows whether I should be able to go and see you there? Whereabouts is this Homburg? Is it Homburg vor der Hohe, or Hessen-Homburg where the prince comes from, or which? Just now it seems to me as if I had also heard of one in the Taunus; if so, and that be yours, could not we meet somewhere between Frankfort and Mainz on the 28th? That would be splendid, and we would come along together past the watch-tower into Frankfort, and have such a fine talk all the evening. Please write me a few lines about this, and about how you are—you would be doing me a great kindness; only say how and when I am to meet you, and give me good news of yourself and your belongings. I can plainly see from your letter that it was an effort to you, and I thank you all the more for having written it; and you must please make another good effort, even if it is only a few lines, and address it to Herr Mendelssohn, Coblenz, and then I shall get it quick and sure. I am drawing a great deal, but composing little; but I wish I were at the "Pfarreisen." Forgive this stupid letter; farewell, and may we have a happy meeting on the Main, in good health.

Always your F. M. B.

In consequence of this letter I must have offered to meet Mendelssohn at Hochst, which I could easily reach from Homburg. Nothing came of it, however, as may be seen from the following note:
Coblentz, 27th August, 1836.

Dear Old Drama:—I got your letter yesterday at Cologne, and could only answer it to-day from here in great haste, for it is better to tell you the rest. I shall not be able to say exactly when I go from Mainz to Frankfort, and come to Hochst. I have to have leeches on my stupid foot to-day, par ordre du mouflon (chirurges), and so must stay here to-morrow and keep quiet; it would be too horrible if I came to Frankfort and had to stay in. I hope to be able to come on Monday evening, but I may still perhaps start to-morrow morning, and in any case I am too uncertain to be able to give you a rendezvous. I must obey the leeches; but anyhow I could not have gone to Homburg with you; I feel myself far too much drawn to the old Free-town, and you know how I long to be there. Do come back there soon, and let me find a line from you, posto restante, Frankfort, to say how and when you will come, so that I may meet you. Remember me to your people, and keep well and happy, in major, and 6/4 chords of all sorts.

Your F. M. B.

Mendelssohn’s engagement took place while I was at Homburg—a great event, and much spoken of. He called on us one afternoon with his fiancée and her sister, but as he had only a very short time to be with her, one could not make any demands on so happy a bridegroom. Toward the end of September, if not sooner, he was obliged to return to Leipzig duties, and could not even remain for a great rural festivity given at the “Sandhof” by the grandparents of Cecile, to celebrate the engagement. He went off with post-horses, in an old carriage which my mother lent him. I had put off my journey to Italy, so as to undertake the direction of the Cecilia Society, and shortly afterward received the following letter:

Leipzig, 29th October, 1836.

My Dear Ferdinand:—Cecile says you are angry with me,—but I say, don’t be so, at least not very, for my long silence really may be forgiven. You can not have any idea of the heap of work

* I had given my first Concert Overture in D minor, which I have mentioned once or twice, the title of “Overture to the Old Drama of Fernando;” this brought about the often-repeated expression of “Old Drama,” and so on. When it was published I omitted this title, as it referred to a drama which is only now beginning by degrees to be an old one.
Mendelssohn.

that is put upon me; they really drive it too far with music here, and the people never can get enough. I have rehearsals almost every day, sometimes two, or rehearsal and concert the same day, and when I am tired and done up with talking and beating time, I do n't like then to sit down and write to you. If you had been a really nice fellow you would long ago have sent me a few lines, and have thought, "As he does not write first, he probably can't, so I will," and certainly you are not as driven and worried as I am; and then you often see Cecile, and you might have written to me about her, and you do n't do it a bit, and yet you expect to be called noble-minded! But I won't complain if you will make up for it directly, and write and describe everything which has happened to you since the 19th of September at midnight.

About myself there is really nothing to say. I conduct the Subscription Concerts and divers others, and I wish with all my heart I were at the "Fahrthor." You have plenty to write about—how you are living, how your people are, whether you have time and inclination for composing, how my pianoforte piece is getting on, and the Cecilia Society; how my bride is looking, how you behave in their house, about Schelble, about the fat P., about all Frankfort (where I would so gladly be, and you perhaps in Leipzig); all this you must write about, and do it very soon, dear Ferdinand.

After all I have something to tell you about, and that is our second Subscription Concert and your Overture in E, with which you gave me and all of us real and heartfelt pleasure. It sounded extremely fresh and beautiful with the orchestra, and was played with real liking; some parts, from which on the piano I had not expected so much, came out admirably in the orchestra, especially one where it goes down fortissimo in whole notes (your favorite passage, very broad and strong) and sounds splendid, and my wind instruments went at it so heartily that it was quite a treat. David made the strings do it all with the down bow—you should have heard it; and then the softness of the wind instruments, and the return E major pianissimo! The whole composition gave me more pleasure than ever, and I liked it better than any of the new ones that I know. The so-called public were less delighted than I had expected and wished, because it is just the kind of thing that they can and ought to understand; but I think it comes from their not yet having seen your name on any instrumental composition, which always makes them chary of their enthusiasm in Germany. So it's lucky that the Director of the theater sent the very next day to ask for the Overture for a concert which is to be given in the theater in a week or two, and I promised it him. (I hope you don't mind.) On the 8th of January we do the one in D minor, and toward the end of the winter I shall probably repeat both. I do n't know what the reviews have said about it, for I did not read them; Finck said to me that it was "beautiful writing," and Sch . . . was going to write at length about it—God grant it may be something good. But what does it matter? The generality of musicians here were very much pleased with it, and that is the chief thing. But when is my pianoforte piece coming?

You had better not boast so much about your Cecilia Society; we Leipzigers are getting up a performance of "Israel in Egypt," which will be something quite perfect; more than 200 singers, with orchestra and organ, in the church;—I look forward to it immensely. We shall come out with it in about a week, and that is also one of the things which makes my head in a whirl just now, for these rehearsals, with all the amateurs, ladies and gentlemen, singing and screaming away all at once, and never keeping quiet, are no easy matter. You are better off at the Cecilia Society, where they have been well drilled into obedience,—but then they criticise among themselves, and that is n't nice either. In fact—and so on! I wish I were at the "Fahrtor"—and also at the "Pfarreien," you may believe me or not. Stamay is staying here, and I have got to teach him counterpoint—I declare I really do n't know much about it myself. He says, however, that that is only my modesty. And the carriage! How am I ever to thank you enough for it now? . . .

Are you a Freemason? People declare that there are some fourpart songs for men's voices in the lodge here, which no one but a Freemason could have composed. Do you still mean to keep to your Italian journey in the spring? Pray, dear Ferdinand, write soon and long, and forgive my silence, and do n't punish me for my small paper with the same. My best remembrances to your mother, and write soon and keep well and happy. Your

And a few weeks later this one:—

Leipsic, 26th November, 1836.

Dear Ferdinand:—Here is your Overture (if you object to my having kept the autograph I will bring it to you at Christmas and exchange) and the copies of your songs which you wanted, and which I went and got from Hofmeister. Many thanks for your delightful long letter, but now that I hope, please God, to be in Frankfort this day three weeks, I hardly feel in the mood to answer it properly. It is so much nicer and pleasanter to do it oneself in person. I should have sent you the Overture long ago, if the copyist had not kept me waiting such a shameful time; the one in E will have to be repeated at one of the next concerts, and now I am curious to see what they will say to the D minor. As to the carriage, I am thinking of bringing it back myself at Christmas. I am having it repaired a little, and the smith declares it will then be perfect. I owe your mother many thanks for having lent it me. Stamaty will be at Frankfort in a few days, on his way back to Paris—I maintain that he has got Le Roi de la Gare and du contrepoint double par dessus les oreilles—and in three weeks, please God, myself come to Frankfort. O that I were at the "Piarrisei"! I should first come and say good evening to you and then turn to the right. Today I can only say, auf Wiedersehen! Remember me to your mother. Your

FELIX M. B.

I have very little to tell about the short visit which he paid his fiancée at Christmas, excepting that I saw him often than I could have expected under the circumstances. He interested himself much in my work at the Caecilia Society, where they had begun studying "St. Paul" under my directions. Our performance of it was the first after the Leipsie one, which Mendelssohn himself had conducted—though in reality the third, counting that of the Dusseldorf Festival, while the work was still in manuscript.

Shortly after his return to Leipsie I received the following letters:—

LEIPSIC, 10th January, 1837.

DEAR FREDRICK ("OLD DRAMA"):—First let me thank you for the recus vireum which you lent me, and which I now return; they were of the greatest service, for I had very little left when I got here. Still I do n’t think that that was the chief reason why I felt so dreadfully low when I came into my room again on the evening of my return—so low, that even you with your tiny heart would have pitied me; I sat quite quiet for full two hours, doing nothing but curse the Subscription Concerts to myself. And with this old strain I come back to Hafiz, and wish I were at the "Piarrisei." I am always happy there. Tell me yourself, what pleasure can I take in the remaining nine concerts, in the Symphony by II. and the Symphony by S.? The day after tomorrow we have Molique's symphony, and that is why I am writing to you, because we had to put off your Overture till the next concert, when we shall also have [Sterndale] Bennett's pianoforte concerto, the sacrifice scene from "Idomeneo," and Beethoven's B flat symphony. I meant not to write before next Friday, but as that would put it off for a week, and I want to save my reputation as a man of business, I will write again then. So you had better look out and answer me before that or I shall abuse your Overture, or rather, make it go badly, and intrigue against it, secondum ordinem Melodiae, etc. You once praised me for making friends of all the German composers, but this winter it's the very reverse—I shall be in hot water with them all. I have got six new symphonies lying here; what they are like, God only knows. I would rather not; not one of them would please, and nobody has to bear the blame but me, because I never let any composers but myself have a chance, especially in symphonies. Good heavens! Ought not the Capellmeisters to be ashamed of themselves, and smite their breasts? But they spoil everything with their cursed artistic consciousness and the wretched divine spark which they are always reading about.

When am I to have my pianoforte piece, "Drama?"

I have sent my six Preludes and Fugues to the printer to-day; they will not be much played, I fear; still I should very much like you to look them through some time, and tell me if anything pleased you in them, and also anything to the contrary. The Organ Fugues are to be printed next month; me voila perequate! I wish to goodness that some rattling good pianoforte passage would come into my head, to do away with the bad impression. Oh, dear! I only really care about one thing, and that is the calendar. Easter falls early—I wish it would fall now. However, I have informed my Directors that I must leave directly after the last concert (17th of March), and can not conduct any oratorio, either my own or the Angel Gabriel's, because of family affairs. They understand this, and think it quite fair. If only I had not to wait so long. How many times must it thaw, and freeze, and rain, and must I be shaved, and drink my coffee in the morning, and conduct symphonies, and take walks, before March comes. Schumann, David, and Schleinitz (though he does not know you) wish to be remembered to you. I must leave off and go to dinner; in the afternoon we rehearse Molique, in the evening there is a fête for the newly married couple (the Davids); his wife is really here, and is a Russian, and he is married to her, and is a brother-in-law of Prince Lieven, and our "Concertmeister." It is needless to say more. Many remembrances and good wishes to your dear mother, and many compliments to Mdlle. J. And so farewell, and do not forget your

Felix M. B.

Leipsic, 24th January, 1837.

My dear Ferdinand:—I have to give you my report of the performance of your D minor Overture,* which took place last Thursday evening. It went very well; we had rehearsed it very carefully several times, and many parts of it greatly surpassed my expectations; the most beautiful of all is the A minor piano passage in the wind, and the melody that follows it—it sounds capital; then also, at the beginning of the so-called working-out, the forte in G minor, with the piano after it (your own favorite passage), and then the drums and wind instruments piano in D major right at the end. The winding-up sounds far better in the orchestra than I had expected. But I must tell you that after the first rehearsal, relying on the good understanding between us, I could not resist changing the basses to the melody in A—and also where it comes back in F and in D—from staccato to sustained notes; you can't think how restless they made it sound, so I hope you won't be annoyed at my taking such a liberty; I am convinced you would have done the same, for it did not sound at all as you wanted it to.

But now, there is still something on my mind which I want to say. The Overture, even at the performance, did not take hold of the musicians as I had wished, but left us all a little cold. This would have been of no consequence at all, but it was remarkable that all the musicians whom I spoke to, said the same—they had all been extremely pleased with the first subject and the whole of the opening and the melodies in A minor and major, and so far had felt quite worked up by it, but from that point their liking began to decrease, till by the end, the good and striking impression of the subject was forgotten, and they felt no more interest in the music. This seems to me important, for it touches again upon a matter about which we have had such endless discussions, and the want of interest with which it is possible for you at any time to regard your art, must at last be felt by others also. I would not like to say this to you if I were not so perfectly convinced that the point is just one at which every man is left to himself, and where neither nature, nor talent, not even the very greatest, can help him, but only his own will. I dislike nothing more than finding fault with a man's nature or talent; it only depresses and worries and does no good; one can not add a cubit to one's stature, all striving and struggling are useless there, so one has to be silent about it, and let the responsibility rest with God. But when it is a case like the present with your work, where all the themes, everything which is talent or inspiration (call it what you will) is good and beautiful and impressive, and the development alone not good, then I think it may not be passed over;—there, I think that blame can never be misplaced,—that is the point where one can improve oneself and one's work,—and as I believe that a man with splendid capacities is under an obligation to become something great, and that it may justly be called his own fault if he does not develop himself exactly in proportion to the means given him—I also believe it ought to be the same with a piece of music. Do n't tell me, it is so, and therefore it must be so; I know perfectly well that no musician can make his thoughts or his talents otherwise than what Heaven has given them to him; but I also know that if Heaven has given him good ones, he must also be able to develop them properly. And do n't go and tell me that we are all mistaken, and that your treatment is always as good as your invention; I do n't think it is. I do think that as far as regards your talents you are equal to my musician of the day, but I know hardly any piece of yours which is satisfactorily worked out. The two overtures are certainly your best things, but the more clearly you express yourself, the more one feels what is wanting, and what in my opinion you ought to remedy.

Do n't ask me how; for you know that best yourself; after all it is only the affair of a walk, or a moment—in short, of a thought. If you laugh at me for all this long story, you will perhaps be doing very right; but certainly not, if you are angry, or bear me a grudge for it,—it is foolish of me even to think of such a thing; but how many musicians are there who would put up with it from another? And as you must see from every word how I love and admire your talent, I may also say that you are not perfect—and that would offend most musicians. But not you, for you know how I take the matter to heart.

As for that passage in Bach, I do n't happen to have the score, and I should not be able to find it here at once, but I never considered it a misprint, though the edition generally swarms with them. Your version seems to me therefore incorrect. I should have thought the A flat quite necessary at "Thou smotest them"—and peculiarly Bachish. Kind regards. Your F. M.

This letter, in which Mendelssohn lectures me so affectionately, appears in the second volume of his published letters, but I felt that I could not omit it here; and I must add a few words, with regard to "the matter about which we had had such endless discussions," as Felix says,—a matter in which to this day I believe myself to be right, though I do not therefore by any means wish to set myself up against his criticism of my compositions at that time.

That a composer must be born—that unless there is natural power working in him with all the force of instinct, he will produce nothing of paramount greatness—there can be as little doubt as that he must learn and study all that is to be learned, as much and more than he would do for mere technical purposes. But the question now arises, Where does the inborn power end, and the power of workmanship begin? According to Mendelssohn's opinion, as expressed above, all that comes within the range of invention of melody belongs to the first power, and the development to the second, in which the strong will, coupled with the presupposed amount of ability and dexterity, deals like a master with the material in hand. This view of his, no doubt shared by many, arose from the twofold source of his harmonious nature and his perfectly matured artistic education. The general spontaneity of melodic thought can not be denied; and though with the acceptance or rejection of the first inspiration criticism already comes into play, the choice in that case is not so infinite as it becomes in the working-out of the leading ideas—and choice is always distracting. But in spite of this, it seems to me a mistake to consider the final development as less dependent on original genius than the first discovery; for if this development rests only on what has been learned and studied—if the qualities of poetical creation do not come into play in the same degree in both cases—if it is not fresh, living, and original, it can not make any impression; the cleverness and learning of a musician will always meet with due recognition, but will not make him pass for an inspired composer. One might even assert, that in the union of musical thought and speculation with the void power of the imagination, a still higher degree of productive genius is called out than in the formation of the simple melodious idea; if, indeed, this latter, as soon as it passes beyond the most elementary forms, does not at once need the strongest chisel and the finest file. I find the proofs of this opinion in the masterpieces which adorn our art. In the best works of the five great masters, Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, it is impossible to point out any separation between invention and treatment, as soon as such a separation becomes possible, they no longer stand at their greatest height. In fact, there are not a few cases where just the whole force of their genius shows itself in works which have developed from comparatively unimportant germs; as, on the other hand, with inferior composers, the weakness of the working-out and the poverty of invention are much on the same level. If there are some composers of great genius in whose works “form” (a word often used and generally misused) goes for less than the material which has been given to them, this is a want which certainly lies more in their natural gifts than in their education. For assuredly we are attributing far too much to artistic education and development if we can see nothing in natural gifts, so far as they hold any high position, beyond the mere power of inventing melodies. Among the countless gifts with which Nature must endow the man whom she designs for a great composer, one of the most essential is a firm will to absorb himself in his own ideas. It may sound hopeless to say that this also, in art, is inborn; it is still more hopeless to see many possessing it without the material on which they might worthily employ it.

Mendelssohn, who was endowed with all these gifts, only in less measure than the very greatest of his predecessors, possessed also in a very prominent degree that indefatigableness which made him devote the minitest care, as well as the whole force of his energy, to attaining his ideal. He could not conceive that anything else was possible. And yet after all, toward the close of the letter just quoted, he himself admits that the best must always be the half-unconscious; for what else—to use his own words—can be said to be "the matter of a walk, or a moment—in short, of a thought?"

I need hardly add, that I have no wish to deny the necessity of the most uninterrupted, strenuous, and painstaking work.
CHAPTER V.

Mendelssohn was married on the 23rd of March, the ceremony taking place in the French Reformed Church, to which his bride belonged. It seemed strange to hear any one so thoroughly German harangued in French on this solemn occasion; but the simplicity of the service, and the wonderful fascination of the young couple, touched and impressed every one. I had composed a marriage song for the reception of the newly married pair at the grandparents' house, and for its performance had engaged the services of the ladies belonging to a small choral society which I had conducted every week during the past winter at the E.'s house. In spite of all the admiration and veneration of these young ladies for Mendelssohn, and though they knew we had leave, and that it was very pretty and laudable to show so great an artist such an attention, it was not without some embarrassment that the graceful band entered the strange house under my direction, and took up their position in battle array before the eyes of the astonished servants, to await the expected arrival. But Mendelssohn and his charming bride were so touched and pleased, and the numerous members of the family were, as might have been expected, so extremely amiable, that the fair singers soon completely forgot their doubtful situation, and thoroughly enjoyed being in the thick of the merry throng.

The young couple went first to spend some time at the charming town of Freiburg-im-Breisgau. A place more congenial to their poetic and artistic tastes could hardly have been found. It is a smiling little city, with clear streams running through the streets, glorious hills looking down on it all around, lovely environs with views over mountain and valley, river and plain; and besides all this, the homely, simple, South-German dialect and manners—a perfect place for a honeymoon. It will be remembered that Cecile had great talent for painting. A journal,* unique of its kind, which she and Felix kept together, and which I was allowed to see on their return, contains written matter and drawings by each in turn, landscapes, houses, little scenes in which they took part—in fact, hundreds of things done on the spur of the moment. During their absence I constantly heard news of their doings from the lively and communicative Madame Jeanneaud. In the middle of May the happy pair returned to Frankfort. Felix writes in a letter to Devrient: “I can only tell you that I am perfectly happy and in good spirits, and though I never should have thought it, not the least over-excited, but just as calm and settled as if it were all quite natural.” In this tranquil, happy frame I found him on his return. But when he showed me the 52nd psalm, the musical result of his wedding tour, I was astonished—though only so long as I had seen nothing but the title. For the tender and longing pathos which pervades some parts of it is based on a foundation of perfect trust in God, and the subdued sentiment which for the most part characterizes the work, may well harmonize with the blissful feelings of deep happiness which penetrated him at the time. The final chorus, the words of which do not belong to the psalm, and which he composed afterward at Leipzig, seems to me not entirely in keeping with the other movements.

However, I must at once protest against the possible misunderstanding of my being supposed to hold artistic creation in general to be the produce of the state of mine at the moment. Even in the most ordinary life the mood of the mind changes so constantly, that if one were to follow it, no artistic work of any unity would ever come into being—these matters are ruled by other and higher laws. But anything which was the result of such a wedding tour naturally leads one to make observations and draw comparisons, though I should hardly have expressed them if they had not forced themselves upon me at the time.

* Now in the possession of Mendelssohn's youngest daughter, Madame Wach, at Bonn.
In the midst of the engagements and excitements which now engrossed the young pair, Felix composed his beautiful E minor quartet, the progress of which I watched with the keenest interest. I must not forget one of the last occasions on which I conducted the Cecilia society, the performance being in honor of the young couple; it consisted chiefly of selections from "St. Paul," though with pianoforte accompaniment only; and I remember Mendelssohn's especial delight with the fine rendering of some of the chorales, which I had made the chorus sing a cappella.

It was now almost time for me to set out on my Italian journey. Mendelssohn, meanwhile, traveled on down the Rhine, but we hoped to see him again in a few days. Our hopes were, however, disappointed, and I soon received the following letter from him from Bingen:—

Bingen, 13th July, 1837.

Dear Ferdinand:—When you got into the carriage the other day at Homburg, and drove off with your ladies, I must have had a presentiment that we should not meet again for the present; I felt almost sure we should not. It is strange enough that it has really turned out so. I shall not return to Frankfort before my English journey, but in eight or ten days I go from here to Koblenz, and so on, slowly down the Rhine; and in September, when I get to Frankfort for half a day, you will already be far away in the mountains, perhaps across the Alps. Who knows where and when we may meet again? In any case, I hope, unchanged; we should have had so much to talk about before the long separation; but the chief thing is that we must have a happy meeting some time or other.

I could not manage it differently; the journey here was rather a helter-skelter affair, and then I was quite prepared to find the inn as uncomfortable as the one in Homburg, and no lodgings to be had; in that case we should very soon have come back to Frankfort, and I should have betaken myself to the Hotel de Russie. Contrary to our expectation we found the inn quite bearable, the view beautiful, and the neighborhood and environs so splendid and varied, that after a few days I put off thinking about returning to Frankfort, and now have quite given it up, for I hope that my people will go on a little further with me. You really can not think how this beautiful spot on the Rhine grows upon me, and how it attracts me, though I have often seen it in a superficial way. In five minutes, with a boat, I am at the "Mauerkirn," my favorite point, and then over at Rudesheim; and the Rhine is so beautiful in the changeable weather, and even after the storm of yesterday. Thank God, my dear Cecile is well and cheerful; if I tell you that I love her more every day, you won't believe me, but it is literally true. I have not worked much here, I mean not written much, but I have a new violin quartet, all but finished, in my head, and I think I shall finish my pianoforte concerto next week. I have mostly followed your advice in the alterations in the E minor violin quartet, and they improve it very much; I played it over to myself the other day, on an abominable piano, and quite enjoyed it, much more than I should have imagined. And so one day passes like another, but all are happy. This letter is to remind you of our agreement that you should always write on the 15th of the month and I on the 1st. Do let us keep to this, dear Ferdinand, even if the letters contain only a few lines or words, the regular correspondence is so precious. Please leave your E minor Symphony at the Souchays' for me when it comes from Paris, so that I may take it to Leipzig in September; I shall immensely enjoy having a good look at it and hearing it again properly. The Cecilia Society wanted to have another musical evening in your especial honor, and I had promised to conduct; but I had to give that up too. Did anything come of it after all? And do all the musical heads in Frankfort still show their teeth at one another? And does — show you his stumps? It annoyed me more even than I said at the time, this stupid behavior of the German musicians. But it is God's will, so let the devil take them. Even their daily life is a mere hell upon earth. And so farewell; I have got back at last into the angry style again. My address till the 1st of August is here, poste restante; from then till the 10th, Coblenz, poste restante; from then till the 20th, Dusseldorf, ditto; from then till the 20th of September, London, care of C. Klingemann, Holbert Place, Eaton Square, Pimlico; from the end of September again in Leipzig. Is not that very precise? And my pianoforte piece? Am I ever to get it? Do tell me, for I should so like something new and good to play, and I can hardly count on my concerto for that. And now farewell, dear friend. Write to me soon. Many, many remembrances to your mother, and thank her for the love and kindness which she has so often shown me; think of me sometimes, and let us look forward to a happy meeting soon. Your Felix M. B.
Mendelssohn.

I, too, at last set out on my journey, beginning by wandering through the Black Forest on foot, and spending some delightful days in Baden with my friend Ferdinand David, also just married, and his lively, refined, and interesting wife. Thence I went to the Tyrol, and late in the autumn to Italy, where I spent that winter, and where my mother, who could not bear to be separated from me, joined me as soon as the weather began to get pleasant. Mendelssohn's letters to me during that time, some of which follow here, give a far better picture of the highly gifted man, and the true friend, than my pen can possibly do.

London, 1st September, 1837.

Dear Ferdinand:—Here I sit—in the fog—very cross—without my wife—writing to you, because your letter of the day before yesterday requires it; otherwise I should hardly do so, for I am much too cross and melancholy to-day. It's nine days since I parted from Cecile at Dusseldorf; the first were quite bearable, though very wearisome; but now I have got into the whirl of London—great distances—too many people—my head crammed with business and accounts and money matters and arrangements—and it is becoming unbearable, and I wish I were sitting with Cecile, and that I had let Birmingham be Birmingham, and that I could enjoy my life more than I do to-day. Damn it—you know what that means, don't you? and I have three more weeks of it before me, and have got to play the organ at B. on the 22d and be in Leipzig again on the 30th—in a word, I wish I were rid of the whole business. I must be a little fond of my wife, because I find that England and the fog and beef and porter have such a horribly bitter taste this time—and I used to like them so much. You seem to be having a splendid journey, and this letter will see finer country than I do, as it has to go to Innspruck. Do inquire at Innspruck if anybody knows anything about a Herr Christianell of Schwatz, who has written to me twice, and calls himself a great amateur of music, and about whom I should like to know more. And so you are seriously thinking about your Jeremiah, and all the while striding off to Italy to compose operas there for the season? You really are a mad "old Drama."

It is pretty quiet here. Most people are away in the country or elsewhere. The Moscheles have been at Hamburg already some weeks, and I shall not see them. Thalberg is giving concerts at Manchester and other places; he has made an extraordinary sensation and is very much liked everywhere, and I hope still to meet him. Rosenhain is at Boulogne, and comes back soon; Benedict at Putney, a la campagne; Miss Clara Novello traveling from one Festival to another, and will probably only be in Italy next spring—till then she comes to Leipzig for our concerts (pray forgive me, I would willingly give her up to you, but—duty). I met Neukomm on the Rhine steamer, as polite and unapproachable as ever, and yet showing a friendly interest in me; he asked a great deal after you, etc. Simrock promised to write directly, and put himself into communication with you about the manuscripts; I told him I did not know whether you had anything for him just at present, that it was more for the future; has he written? I have heard nothing from my people in Berlin for so long (more than five weeks) that I am beginning to be anxious—and that adds greatly to my melancholy. I composed a great deal whilst we were on the Rhine, but I don’t mean to do anything here but swear,—and long for my Cecile. What’s the good of all the double counterpoint in the world when she is not with me? I must leave off my complaints and my letter, or you will be laughing at me at Innsbruck in the sunshine. Address to Leipzig again— I wish I were there. It seems that Chopin came over here quite suddenly a fortnight ago, paid no visits and saw nobody, played very beautifully at Broadwood’s one evening, and then took himself off again. They say he is still very ill and miserable. Cecile will have given my remembrances to your people herself. So farewell, dear “Drama,” and forgive this horridly stupid letter; it is exactly what I am myself. Your Felix M. B.

The chief thing I leave for the P. S., just as all girls do. Am I ever to get your E minor Symphony? Do send it to me! You have cheated me out of my concert piece. Get me the E minor Symphony; the Leipzigers must hear it—and like it.

Leipzig, 10th December, 1837.

My dear Feibeskand—I thank you with all my heart for having written to me in November, in spite of my last month’s irregularity; I really could hardly have believed it. The arranging of my new house, moving into it, with many concerts and a deal of business; in short, all the impediments, whatever they may be, which a regular Philistine, like I, can only enumerate to a smart and lively Italian like you—my installation as master of the house, tenant, musical director of the subscription concerts—all this prevented me from doing my regular correspondence last month. But just because of that I wanted to beg you, and I do beg you to-day most earnestly, that in spite of all the inconceivable difference of our position and surroundings, we should stick fast to our promise of monthly letters. I feel that it might be doubly interesting and good for us both to hear about each other, now that we have become so desperately divided, and yet just for that reason all the nearer to each other. At least I find that whenever I think of Milan and Liszt and Rossini, it gives me a curious feeling to remember that you are in the midst of it all; and with you in the plains of Lombardy, it is perhaps the same when you think of me and Leipzig. But next time you must write me a long detailed letter, full of particulars; you can’t imagine how they interest me. You must tell me where you live, what you are writing, and everything that you can about Liszt and Fixis and Rossini, about the white dome, about the Corso—I do so love that enchanting country, and it’s a double pleasure to hear from you from it—you really mustn’t use half-sheets there. Above all, tell me if you enjoy it and revel in it as thoroughly as I did? Mind you do, and mind you drink in the air with as much ecstasy, and idle away the days as systematically as I did—but why should I say all this, you will do it anyhow. Only please write me a great deal about it.

You want to know whether I am satisfied here? Just tell me yourself if I ought not to be satisfied, living here with Cecile in a nice, new, comfortable house, with an open view over gardens and fields and the city towers, feeling so serenely happy, so calmly joyful as I have never felt since I left my parents’ house, and being able to command good things, and good-will on all sides? I am decidedly of opinion, either this place or none at all. I felt that very strongly after the reports about—’s place in——; no ten horses and no ten thousand thalers could take me there, to a little court, which for that very reason is more pretentious than the great ones, with the utter isolation of petty musical doings, and the obligation of being there the whole year managing the theater and the opera, instead of having my six months free. However, there are also many days when I think no post would be the best of all. Two months of such constant conducting takes more out of me than two years of composing all day long; in the winter I hardly get to it at all here. At the end of the greatest turmoil if I ask myself what I have actually been doing, after all it is hardly worth speaking of; at least it does not interest me particularly whether or not all the recognized good things are given one time more or better. I am only interested now in the new things, and of these there are few enough. I often think I should like to retire completely, never conduct any more, and only write; but then again there is a certain charm in an organized musical system like this, and in having the direction of it. But what will you care about this in Milan? Still I must tell you, if you ask me how I like being here. I felt the same thing at Birmingham; I have never before made such decided effort with my music as there, and have never seen the public so entirely taken up with me alone, and yet there is something about it, what shall I call it, something light and evanescent, which rather saddens and depresses than encourages me. It so happened that there was an antidote to all these eulogies, on the spot, in the shape of Neukomm. This time they ran him down wholesale, received him in cold silence, and completely set him aside in all the arrangements, whereas three years ago they exalted him to the skies, put him above all other composers, and applauded him at every step. You will say that his music is not worth anything, and in that no doubt we agree, but still, those who were enraptured then, and now affect such superiority, do not know that I am indignant about the whole affair, and Neukomm's quiet, equable behavior appeared to me doubly praiseworthy and dignified when compared to theirs. This resolute demeanor of his has made me like him much better. Just fancy also that I had to go straight from the organ-loft into the mail coach, and drive for six days and five nights on end till I got to Frankfort, then on again from there the next day, arriving here only four hours before the beginning of the first concert. Well, then, since that we have given eight concerts, such as you know, and the "Messiah" in the church. Our star this winter is Clara Novello, who has come over for six concerts, and has really delighted the whole public. When I listen to that healthy little person, with her pure clear voice, and her animated singing, I often think that I have actually stolen her away from you in Italy, for she was going straight there, and now will not go till the spring. But by persuading her to come here I was able to do our cause the greatest service, for this time it is she alone who puts life and spirit into it, and as I said before, the public are wild about her. The air from "Titus" with coro di lassetto, the Polacca from Bellini's "Puritani," and an English aria of Handel's, have driven the public quite frantic, and they swear that without Clara Novello there is no salvation. Her whole family are here with her, and are very pleasant people. You are often and much thought of. The finest of the new things was Beethoven's "Glorreicher Augenblick," a long Cantata (three-quarters of an hour, choruses, solos, etc.) in honor of the three monarchs who met at the Vienna Congress. There are splendid things in it, among others a Caratina,—a prayer, quite in Beethoven's grand style, but with wretchedly stupid words, where "hehrer Glanz" is made to rhyme with "Kaiser Franz," followed by a great flourish of trumpets, and now Haslinger has actually put other words to it, and calls it "The praise of Music," and these are even more wretched, for "poesy" is made to rhyme with "noble harmony," and the flourish of trumpets comes in—still more stupidly. And so we spend our days in Germany. David played my E minor quartet in public the other day, and is to repeat it today "by special desire." I am curious to know how I shall like it; I thought it much prettier last time than I did at first, but still I do not care much about it. I have begun a new one which is almost finished, and which is better. I have also done a few new songs, some of which would probably please you, but my pianoforte concerto I think you would challenge. It's your own fault, why have you not sent me your promised piece? You perhaps don't know that Ricordi, the music-seller, often sends parcels here to Wilhelm Hartel. So you might put it in some day. There's a delicate reminder! I have had to get the score of your E minor Symphony written out from the parts; the score that came with it (in your own hand) had an almost totally different first movement, the Allegro Vivace in C instead of E, and the two last movements quite different,—in short, I did not know what to do, and only yesterday had the pleasure of receiving the old well-known score from the copyist and playing it through at once. I have put it down for one of the January concerts, and it will form the second part by itself. The two middle movements are quite superb. Now I must stop. Give Liszt many remainders from me, and tell him how often and with what pleasure I think of him. Remember me to Rossini, if he likes being remembered by me. And above all, keep fond of me yourself. Your

Felix

Lipsia, 20th January, 1838.

You Milanese "Drama," you begin your letter so contemptuously, and look down so upon my reminder about punctuality, that I had almost resolved, first to be very punctual myself, and secondly not to remind you any more. But as you may see from the date that I have not kept the first resolution, I also can not answer for my keeping the second and slipping a reminder into this letter now and then—you may attend to them or despise them, as you like; I am past improvement, as you see (I mean, "incorrigible"). But joking apart, I should have written to you at the New Year, and thanked you for your dear good wishes, and given you mine, but I was prevented in the most tiresome way by an indisposition or illness which attacked me in the last week of the year and unhappily has not yet subsided. This has put me into such bad spirits, and at times made me so desperate, that even to-day I only write because I see that it is no use waiting till I am better. I am suffering, as I did four years ago, from complete deafness of one ear, with occasional pains in the head and neck, etc.; the weakness in the ear keeps on without any interruption, and as I had to conduct and to play in spite of it (I have been keeping my room for a fortnight), you may imagine my agony, not being able properly to hear either the orchestra, or my own playing on the piano. Last time it passed off after six weeks, and God grant that it may do the same this time; but though I summon up all my courage, I can not quite help being anxious, as, till now, in spite of all remedies, there is no change, and often I do not even hear when people are speaking in the room. Besides this there is another, still greater anxiety, from which I hope every day to be released, and which does not leave me for a moment. My mother-in-law has been here for a fortnight; you know for what reason. When you see your whole happiness, your whole existence, depending upon one inevitable moment, it gives you a peculiar sensation. Perhaps my health will be better when the weather improves. I hardly remember such a winter; for a whole fortnight we have had from 14 to 22 degrees of cold; yesterday at last it was milder, but we had a snow-storm, which is still going on and has almost blocked up the streets. How is it with you in Milan?

A thousand thanks for the details in your last letter; they interest me more than you can imagine, living as you do in the very midst of so much that sounds quite fabulous here. You must tell me a great deal about it all whenever you write; tell me about your Psalm, and how they sang it, and whether you have already begun the opera, and what genre you have chosen, and about Pixis' debut—in short, all about what you are doing and what you like. Here everything goes on in the usual quiet musical way. We have one subscription concert every week; and you pretty well know what we do there. For the New Year, when the concert always opens with sacred music, we performed my psalm, 'As pants the hart.' I have written a new and very elaborate chorus as a finale to it, and the whole psalm pleased me a good deal, because it is one of the few things of my own which I am as fond of now as when I was writing it. A symphony by Taglighsheck, which was very much praised in Paris, and played at the Conservatoire, made very little impression here, and seemed to me nothing particular. Herr Schmidt plays exquisitely; there is no question about his belonging to the first rank, but it is still uncertain whether he will be able sufficiently to master his German anxiety and conscientiousness—that is to say, his weak nerves—so as to make himself generally known and play in London or Paris. He practices the whole day, till he and his fingers are so done up that in the evening it he has to give a concert he is quite tired and exhausted, and then, compared to other times, plays mechanically and imperfectly. His great specialty is playing wide-spread chords. He keeps on all day stretching his fingers, and among other things does the following, prestissimo:

He has also written charming studies, which form a great feature at his concerts. He is now gone to Russia. We played your overture in E at his concert; it went well, and we enjoyed it much. The Fernando Overture will come next; but your mother did not send me the corrected score, only the parts, which I did not want, because we have them here. I got nothing but the score of the E minor Symphony, which you said was to be burned, but with your leave or without it, I shall not do so. It is strange that again I do not take to the last movement, whilst the second and third movements please me more than they did before. The symphony is fixed for one of the February concerts. A symphony by Bürgmüller (from Düsseldorf) was very much liked the other day. Yesterday, Schelinitz brought me your G minor song (in 'Europa'), sang it to me, and made me guess whose it was; to my great annoyance I could not, and was vexed with myself afterward, for I ought to have known it by the beginning and by the close in G minor in the middle. In the way of new things I have almost finished the violin quartet, and also a sonata for piano and cello, and the day before yesterday sent Breitkopf and Härtel six four-part songs for mixed voices, small things for singing in the open air, or at parties. The Novello, who has made la pleine and la beau temps here, and who at her farewell concert was smothered with poems and flowers, and endlessly applauded and shouted at, is gone to Berlin to sing there; she passes through here again, and will perhaps give us two more arias, which Leipzig has begged for on its knees, and is to be in Italy by the spring. In what part, I fancy she knows at present as little as I do. She has given the concerts a splendid impetus this winter, and even if it is difficult to replace her, the good effect will last for a time. But what do you say to Ries' sudden death? It was a great blow to me and gave me a strange feeling, just because his manner and way of going on had displeased me—but this news is such an utter contrast to all that as to make me completely forget everything else for the moment. The Cecilia Society certainly seems strangely fated. I have no idea who could or would undertake it now. Only a week ago Ries was suffering merely from gout and jaundice;—and in two days he is suddenly dead. If you were in Germany now I should say you ought to go to Weimar in Hummel's place; there must be much that is nice about it; perhaps it will remain vacant till you come back some day. You would like Weimar very much. Above all, if you would only come back; there is no want of places, I see that plainly now; it is only the men that are wanting—it's my old story over again. And you say that I am long past all that now. And I hope that it is still before you."

"Leipzig, 14th April, 1838.

"DEAR FERDINAND:—You will be angry with me for my long silence; again I can do nothing but beg pardon, and hope that you will transform your wrath into gentleness when you see my well-known fist. A great deal has happened between this and the last letter, and much which prevented me from writing. No doubt you have heard through your mother that Cécile presented me with a son on the 7th of February; but perhaps you don't yet know that toward the end of the month she suddenly became dreadfully ill and for four days and four nights had to struggle with a terrible fever and all kinds of other evils. Then she recovered, thank God, quicker than could have been expected, though slowly enough, and it is only quite lately that all traces of illness have disappeared, and that she is again as cheerful and looks as well and fresh as you recollect her. What I went through at that time, I could not tell you in any letter, nor indeed in words; but you will be able to imagine it to yourself, dear Ferdinand. And now, that all the anxiety is over, and my wife and child are well, I feel so happy, and yet not a bit ‘philisterhaft;’ you may laugh as much as you like, I do not care, it is too lovely and delightful to see a wee little fellow like that, who has brought his mother’s blue eyes and snub nose into the world with him, and knows her so well that he laughs to her whenever she comes into the room, when he is lying at her breast and they both look so happy—I don’t know what to do with myself for joy. After that I could decline menus, or do finger exercises with anybody for as long as ever they liked, and gladly allow you to laugh at me. In a few days we go to Berlin, so that Cécile may get to know my youngest sister and the whole family; Paul and his wife were here last month, and stood godfather and godmother to the little one at his christening. The little man is called Carl Wolfgang Paul. In Berlin I shall see how my wife gets on at our house; if it is all right, I shall go alone to the musical festival at Cologne in four weeks, and come back directly afterward to Berlin, so as to spend the summer quietly there or here and work. If not, Cécile will go with me to Cologne; but as my mother and sisters would not at all like that, I think she will probably stay with them, and perhaps go to the Rhine with me next year. These are my plans for the present. And you? If I were you I should certainly have trudged off to Rome yesterday for Good Friday and Palm Sunday, and I keep thinking that it is still possible you may have done so. On Palm Sunday I always think of the papal chapel and the golden palm branches; in the way of ceremony and grandeur it is the most solemn and splendid thing that I ever saw, and I should like you to see it and think so too. You do tell me capital things about Milan and your life there; how funny that you should find your Paris circle there again—List, Nourrit, Pixis, etc. But it must all be intensely interesting, and I already look forward to the account you are to give me at Leipzig some day of all the ‘circumstances.’ You will have enough to tell. And indeed you have hit off a horribly truth ful picture of the blissful happiness of a Hofkapellmeister at ——, and the blissful patience of the German public. I have had some terrible glimpses into that during the course of this winter, for instance, in the case of the post at ——, for which they wanted to get me (probably because a couple of newspaper correspondents had said so), and where they have again been using the most beautiful artifices to make me apply for it, because they did not like to speak straightforwardly and properly to a musician; however, they were obliged to at last, and in return I had the pleasure of most politely refusing it, and so I see once more how right you were with your dismal description. And yet there is a certain something in this Germany of ours—I hardly know what, but it attracts me so much, and I should like to convince you. It is my old story over again, which you have already heard two hundred times, and which you have disputed four hundred times.
Certainly the state of the theater, such as you describe it in Italy, is better and has more life in it than ours, but you should help us to bring about an improvement. — and his followers will never do it; they only drive the cart deeper into the mire, and will disappear without leaving a trace.

"But to turn to something better. Could you and would you send me a copy of your Psalm? and also any other new thing that you may have, and give the whole parcel to Ricordi, who often sends things here to W. Härtel? That would be splendid of you, and I beg you many, many times to do it. I also have been rather busy this winter. David played a new violin quartet of mine in E flat, in public the other day at the last of his soirees, and I think you would find real progress in it; I have begun a third. I have also finished a concert piece for piano and orchestra (a sort of serenade and rondo, for of course I shall never get yours), a new Psalm (the 93th).—I suppose I have already written to you about my having added four numbers to the 42d—and then there’s a set of four-part songs for open-air singing, and various other little creatures that would so much like you to clip and brush them a little if you were here. Apropos, is n’t this rich? They have been giving a first performance of my ‘St. Paul’ at Dresden, with all sorts of wonderful preparations, and ten days before, R. writes me a formal letter saying that they wished to shorten the first part a little, and he should therefore cut out the chorus ‘Rise up, arise,’ with the chorale ‘Sleepers wake,’ as those numbers did not appear to him to be necessary for the action. I was stupid enough to be frightfully put out for a whole day at this piece of presumption, but you too will think it rich.

"Clara Novello will really soon be in Italy now. I hear that she is at Munich, and will go on from there direct. She went from here to Berlin, where she had such incredible success that I am afraid it made her a little over-confident, for at Dresden and Vienna, where she went directly afterward, she is said to have made very little sensation. In Berlin, on the other hand, she gave two concerts, sang twice for the poor, four times at the theater, twice at court, and how can I tell where besides? Mind you pay her every possible attention, if she flutters into your arms.

"And now I must close, though I still have quantities of things to say. More next time. My wife sends you many best remembrances. She is busy about the journey. Please write to me to Berlin (Leipziger Strasse No. 3), then you shall have Berlin news in exchange for Milan news (by which I should lose a good many yards). But good-bye, dear Ferdinand, be happy, and always fond of your

"BERLIN, the 15th of July, 1838.

"DEAR FERDINAND.—As all manner of creatures were created by God, to wander about the earth, bad correspondents among the number, do not be too angry with me for having got this nature. I have times when the ink will not flow, and if I could get answers (for instance, from you) without first writing myself, I really should quite forget how to write. You may perceive, first from my long silence and from my present still writing, that this is one of those times. But as I said before, it is for the sake of the answer. I hope you will discover some quite new way of abusing me for the beginning of your letter, because then I am sure to get it soon. And besides, you will have to answer as a man of business, for I am writing on business, to ask about the overture which you promised us for the concerts. What has become of it? I hope we shall get it, and then we can at once put it down for the beginning of the concerts (end of September). Don’t forget that I have not sent you my things by Hartel, as you begged; you know that since then, I came here, and have been leading rather a disturbed life, and besides, what can you want with them now? I would rather play them all to you on your when at last you come back to the Vaterland.” But with you it is different: because yours would be a help to me in my performances, and would give us pleasure, and you have promised it me, and I shall keep you to your word. It is to be hoped the overture is finished, and it is also to be hoped that you will send it. I feel more eager about it than I have about any piece of music for a long time, just as I do about your Italian life and doings altogether. I fancy you now sitting by the lake of Como with your mother; it must be a delicious kind of life. And I suppose you also go lounging about with Liszt, and paying court to the Novelle, who, I hear, is in Milan, taking lessons. Is she still your particular favorite? What do you say to her singing, and to her looks? I have now been here in my old home since May. It gives me a peculiar sensation, so much in it is changed, so much in my own self is changed, and yet there is a sort of comfortable homelike feeling in it as if I had never left it. Then my family is so secluded and isolated here that one really knows very little of Berlin, and hardly comes into contact with anybody but the people in the house. This has its good side, as well as its disadvantages; and looking around me now as a stranger and free from prejudices, I certainly feel glad that I did not stay, however much I may regret it on account of my family; but the climate and the air here are unfruitful and good for nothing. For study, and work, and isolation, Berlin is just the place, but hardly at all for enjoyment. Everything in my former life has now for the first time become quite clear to me, and I see plainly how all my hostilities with the people, and my bad position, were brought about of necessity; and this has made these months especially interesting to me. We are quite pleased with each other now, and on the whole I like Berlin very much, because now that I have got rid of the wretched business altogether, I can enjoy what is good in the place without embittering it to myself. The first evening after my arrival we went to the theater to hear Gluck's 'Armida'; I have hardly ever, if ever, enjoyed anything so much at the opera. That great mass of thoroughly trained musicians and singers, ably conducted by Spontini, the splendid house full to suffocation, the good mio cecore, and with all that the wonderful music, made such an impression on me that I was obliged to say to myself that there was nothing to be done with small towns and small means and small circles, and that it was quite another thing here.

"But how often since have I had to retract that. The very day after, they gave a so-called Memorial Festival for Beethoven, and played his A major Symphony so atrociously, that I soon had to beg many pardons of my small town and my small means; the coarseness and effrontery of the playing were such as I have never heard anywhere, and such as I can only explain to myself by the whole nature of the Prussian official, which is about as well suited for music as a strait-waistcoat is for a man. And even then it is an unconscious strait-waistcoat. Well, since then I have heard a good deal in the way of quartets and symphonies, and playing and singing in private circles, and have altogether begged pardon of my little town. At most places here music is carried on with the same mediocrity and carelessness and assumption as ever, which quite sufficiently explains my old wrath, and the very imperfect means I had of managing things. It all hangs together with the sand, the situation, and the official life, so that though one may enjoy individual appearances well enough, one can not become better acquainted with anybody. The Gluck operas may be reckoned amongst such enjoyable appearances. Is it not strange that they always draw a full house, and that the public applauds and is enchanted and calls the singers back? And that it is about the only place in the world where such a thing is possible? And that the next evening the 'Postillon' draws just as full a house? And that in Bavaria it is forbidden to have any music in any Catholic or Protestant church, because it desecrates the church? And that choirs are becoming obligato at the theatres? Confound it all. However, the chief thing is to get as much novelty as possible, and that there should be plenty of good and beautiful things in the world; that is why I am so eager about your overture and your opera. You will have heard that I was at Cologne for the festival. It all went well; the organ was splendidly effective in Handel and still more so in Bach—(it was some newly discovered music of his, which you don't yet know, with a grand double chorus.) But even that, to my feeling at least, was wanting in the interest that one feels for something new and untried; I like so much when there is that kind of uncertainty which leaves room for me and the public to have an opinion; in Beethoven and Handel and Bach one knows beforehand what it will be, and must always be, and a great deal more besides. You are quite right in saying that it is better in Italy, where people have new music every year, and must also have a new opinion every year—if only the music and the opinions were a little bit better. At this you snort and say, what is 'better'? Well, if you want to know, something more to my taste. But really Germany seems to be possessed with the devil; Guhr has just been giving two tremendously brilliant performances of the 'Creation;' all the newspapers are talking about the passage 'Let there be light,' where Guhr placed the bands of some Austrian and Prussian regiments in the church, and made them blow their loudest. And the Cecilia Society is conducted by V., who as far as I know is the best that they can get; and S. is making speeches in Mozart's honor, and all that is not also to my taste. Perhaps after all my taste is perverted—the possibility of it occasionally dawns upon me—but I must make the best of it, though I certainly have about as much difficulty in swallowing most of these things as the stork had with the porridge in the shallow dish. The stork reminds me of my boy, who is stout, and fat, and merry, and takes after his mother both in looks and disposition, which is an inexpressible delight to me, because it is the best thing he can do. Cécile is well and blooming and sends you many greetings.

"But I have not told you anything about what I have been writing. I mean what music: two rondos for piano, one with and one without orchestra; two sonatas, one with violin, the other with cello; one psalm, and just now I am at a third violin quartet, and have a symphony in my head, which will soon be launched—in B flat. And you? Do you mean to send the overture? A thousand affectionate greetings to your mother. Enjoy your life in that heavenly country and think nicely of me. Your"

"F. M. B."

"Berlin, 17th August, 1838.

"Dear Ferdinand,—Your yesterday's letter delighted me so much that I do not like to lose any time in telling you so. It is the nicest of all that I have ever had from you, and I read it again and again, always with new delight at the happy and tranquil mood which it reflected, at each separate good and loving thing in it, at the beginning and the middle and the end. I am so glad that such happiness should fall to your share, and I wish you joy of it with all my heart, or rather I enjoy it with you, for I see from your letter how well you know how to enjoy it. It must indeed be delightful there at Bellagio with your mother; and it is because you seem so penetrated by this happy feeling, that your letter gave me so much pleasure, for, I confess, I had hardly expected it. What you tell me about the new oratorio is also not so bad, and I can see from all this that you are just now living exactly the sort of life that I always wished you to live, and about which I was always holding forth to you—it's all the same where—may heaven keep it so for you always, and may you always think of me as affectionately as you do in this letter. The Babylonians certainly had valve trumpets (in fact, all Babylon was a kind of valve trumpet); such luxurious, arrogant Orientals would hardly be satisfied with mere trumpets in C. But please don't call them trompettes à piston in your score, I have such a hatred for the word piston—you see I am a regular doctor of philosophy. Well, and when the oratorio is finished, are we to hear it in Germany? Now, that will really be a word in season. Only mind you do it somewhere within my reach, so that I also may have my share in it, I mean in the first performance: you should do it in Leipzig—that would be splendid, and all the singing and playing faculties of the place should be on their mettle for your service. Do get it done soon, and tell me a great deal about it, so that I may at least have a foretaste of it meanwhile.

"I agree with every word you say about the Novello and also about Liszt. I am very sorry that we are not to have the overture, but of course I can understand that you don't want any of it to be played before the first performance. And will that be next winter? And is the whole oratorio actually sketched out in four parts? That's really industrious. In this way you at once give me an example for the ten operas and ten oratorios which you say I am to write in the next twenty years. I assure you, I feel the greatest desire and stimulus to follow your advice and example, if only there were one true poet to be found in the world, and he were my friend. It is too difficult to find all that at once. One would have to be driven to it. Germany is wanting in such people, and that is a great misfortune. Meantime, as long as I don't find any, I shift for myself, and I suppose one will turn up at last. Your psalm with the instrumental accompaniment and your wedding-chorus I received here; haven't I thanked you for them yet? It seems to me as if I had, and if I am mistaken I must tell you again how much pleasure you gave me with the latter, and what happy days are recalled by every note of the former. Your abridged Fernando overture I received at Leipzig, and I think of giving it at the beginning of the subscription concerts; I shall write you all about it, and send it to you directly afterward (at the beginning of November, perhaps, if that is soon enough) by Hartel and Ricordi. I shall add a couple of new things of my own; I wonder what sort of impression they will make upon you in Italy?

"My time at Berlin is almost over now; I think of going back to Leipzig in four days; they are going to do my 'St. Paul' there in the church, and the rehearsals begin next week. Our family life here has been so pleasant. Yesterday evening, when I went over to tea and found them all assembled, I read them a good deal out of your letter, which gave them great pleasure, and they told me to give you many kind remembrances. We were together like that every evening, talking politics, arguing, and making music, and it was so nice and pleasant. We only had three invitations the whole time, and of music in public I heard little more than I was obliged; it is too bad, in spite of the best resources. I saw a performance of 'Oberon' last week which was beyond all conception—I believe the thing never once went together all through; at the Sing-Akademie they sang me a piece of my own, in such a way that I should have got seriously angry if Cecile had not sat by me and kept on saying, 'Dear husband, do calm yourself.' They also played me some quartets, and always bungled the very same passages that they had bungled ten years ago, and which had made me furious ten years ago—another proof of the immortality of the soul. My third violin quartet in D is finished; the first movement pleases me beyond measure, and I wish I could play it to you—especially a forte passage at the end, which you would be sure to like. I am also thinking of composing an opera of Planche's next year; I have already got two acts of the libretto, and like them well enough to begin to set to work. The subject is taken from English history in the Middle Ages, rather serious, with a siege and a famine—I am eager to see the end of the libretto, which I expect next week. I also still hope to get words for an oratorio this year. You see that I was already going to follow your advice of my own accord, but, as I said before, the aid and invention of the poet is wanting, and that is the chief thing. Piano forte pieces are not exactly the things which I write with the greatest pleasure, or even with real success, but I sometimes want a new thing to play, and then it also occasionally happens that something exactly suitable for the piano comes into my head, and even if there are no regular passages in it, why should I be afraid of writing it down? Then, a very important branch of pianoforte music which I am particularly fond of—trios, quartets, and other things with accompaniment—is quite forgotten now, and I greatly feel the want of something new in that line. I should like to do a little toward this. It was with this idea that I lately wrote the sonata for violin, and the one for cello, and I am thinking next of writing a couple of trios. I have got a symphony in B flat in hand now, and mean to get it finished soon. I only hope that we shall not have too many foreign virtuosi at Leipzig this winter, and that I shall not have too many honors to enjoy, which means concerts to conduct.
Mendelsohn.

So Herr F. has gone all the way to Milan. Brr, he is enough to spoil the warm climate. Yes, you see, I have to digest such creatures, and am in Leipsic, instead of at Cadenabbia, where I once was, opposite your present lodging. When I am writing to you at the lake of Como, I feel the greatest longing to see that paradise again, and who knows what I may do in the next years! But you will first have to be here with your oratorio, which is best of all. Do you know that my sister Fanny will perhaps see you soon? She intends going to Italy with her husband and child, and only returning next year. When I know more definitely about her journey I will tell you, so that she may not miss you, as Franck did. Now good-bye, write to me soon to Leipsic, just such another splendid letter. Once more, thanks. Remember me to your mother. Farewell, farewell.

Your

"Leipsic, 15th April, 1839.

My dear good friend:—I feel particularly inclined to write to you today, and have a chat with you; I was just thinking of how I used to lie on your sofa and lament and make you play to me, because I was so much in love; and then I thought, how nice it would be if we could see each other again soon and really live together—and then I thought what a long while off that must be. But I have a lot of business matters to write to you about today, and will begin with these at once. First of all the oratorio. What do you mean by talking about my taking responsibility upon myself—and the risk of looking through the score beforehand, etc.? You insane fellow, as if I did not know all that long before, and also how a work of yours which you yourself take pleasure in and write with real liking will turn out—and you know too how I look forward to such a work, and that I shall devote all the loving care that I can to the performance of it, if you will intrust it to me. Is it really necessary for me to tell you that first? But, so as not to follow my own opinion solely, or to be alone in addressing myself to you, I told the concert-directors about that part of your letter referring to the oratorio (cum grano salis, that is to say, omitting your over-great modesty) and received the following answer from Stadtnath Porsche, the secretary of the concerts; at first I meant to send you the original letter, but I shall copy it instead, because the paper is thick, and the postage would be thick too:

"Honored Sir (notice the legal phraseology)—according to your obliging information, Herr Ferdinand Hiller at Milan is occupied in the composition of an oratorio, "The Prophet Jeremiah," from which great things may be expected as to merit and importance; the concert-directors have commissioned me to assure you that it would afford them much pleasure to see and hear this work performed at one of the concerts during the coming winter of 1839-40; if Herr Hiller will have the kindness to forward the score to us. With the greatest esteem, etc.

"Laurenz, March, 1839.

"It is to be hoped that you won't now think any more about my having too great a responsibility. And I hope that this insignificant opportunity may give you zest and liking for a new work. In your next letter (addressed to Dusseldorf till the middle of May, to Frankfort till the end of June) you must give me a few words, in reply to this, which I may communicate to the directors; it pleases them so immensely when an artist like yourself takes notice of them and Concert-Directorium, and they were all very much flattered by your request. We could not well give it in the church, because we shall have to let our church-concerts rest for a year or two, before we can put them on a proper footing again (it would take too long to explain all the reasons), so it would be in the concert-room, with a large chorus of amateurs; therefore mind you give the chorus plenty to do. And as I said before, answer as soon as you can. A parcel will be going off to you in a few days by Kistner; it has been in his hands all ready packed for the last four weeks, and now he promises really to send it off; it contains the score of my 43d psalm, the 'St. Paul,' and a cello sonata of mine lately publishe, which I only send because of the lovely cover, and by way of a novelty—otherwise there is not much in it. But if you are not pleased with the psalm in its new dress with the old lining, I shall shoot myself. The parcel will be six weeks on the road, I hear, and will be addressed to Giovanni Ricordi at Milan; so you must inquire there when you have an opportunity. Of course you understand that I mean you to keep all the contents of the parcel. I sent off your two overtures, with the metronome marks, to the Philharmonic a fortnight ago, after we had first given a good performance of the one in D minor at the charity concert here, and found your alterations very advantageous. It gains very materially by them, and the flow of it is not at all interrupted. And now, though I am really ashamed to, I must tell you of a newspaper article which I read about you the other day, and which gave me a deal of pleasure. One morning at rehearsal somebody showed me a number of the new musical paper (Schumann, the editor of it, was in Vienna all the winter) in which there was something which concerned me, and looking through the rest of the paper, I found a leading article, continued through two numbers, headed by your name. I took it away with me to read, and a great deal of it really gave me extraordinary pleasure; it is evidently written by some one who is not personally acquainted with you in the very least degree, but on the other hand knows every one of your works most intimately—some one who did not even know that you were no longer in Frankfort, and yet could picture you to himself quite well and distinctly from your compositions, and is evidently very favorably disposed toward you. I hear that it is said to have been written by a German in Warsaw. The real point of the thing is that he thinks that somehow or other you are out of humor, and have resolved not to publish or even compose anything more, and he implores you for Heaven's sake not to carry out this resolution, and not to believe that people do not watch you with sympathy and pleasure, as he does himself for example, and the paper is headed with the motto, 'How great the loss, when such heads make holiday.' You see the man knew nothing of you personally, but that was just why I enjoyed it—and I should have sent it to you, if I had not almost sworn never to put newspaper extracts into my letters. But this and a joke on the last page remind me of the too terrible and awful news of Nourrit's death. It is a long, long time since anything has grieved me so deeply and taken such strong hold of me as this. It made me think of the bright, happy time when I had seen him, of the genuine, free, artist nature which he seemed to have then, of the honor and glory which he gained everywhere, of his wife and children, and of the infinitely sad state of a mind which knew no other remedy but this, which wipes out the whole previous existence with all its happiness as if it had never been. How the news must have shocked you! It was only in your last letter that you were speaking of him; you had seen him so lately, been so fond of him—it is too dreadful. And who can think of, or wish for fame and celebrity and happiness, when any one outwardly so happy and inwardly so gifted, could yet at the same time be so boundlessly unhappy. To me, there is more in this than in the profoundest sermon I ever heard, and once I begin to think of it I can not get over it at all. Do tell me all you can about it; all that you know of further particulars and details. I have heard nothing but the details of the evening before and of his last moments. Tell me, if you know anything about it, what could have brought him to such terrible misery and to such a resolve. It was nothing more than those few kisses and whistings at the theater, as they say in the papers, nobody ought ever to appear in public again after they have once earned bread enough to keep them from starving, or should ever choose a profession which would make them dependent on the public.

"Now I must answer some of the questions in your letter. A number of different people conduct at the Philharmonic, Sir G. Smart, Moscheles, Potter, etc., so it is impossible to foretell into what sort of hands you might fall, clean or unclean. I am quite at sea again about my English opera; the poet won't alter it and I won't compose unless he does—it's the old, old song of the drunken 'Böhmenschmied.' And I always have to begin it over again, for I know I am right. But woe betide you if you praise Mercadante's 'Giuramento,' for I have had the pianoforte arrangement in my room for ever so long and have certainly given myself trouble enough with it, and yet I find it quite insufferable and vulgar, and not a note in it which I cared the least bit about. Don't be angry with me, I can't help it; it's curious that the surroundings and the air and the way of putting it really do make an impression on everybody—but here in Leipzig the 'Giuramento' cuts an awful figure—in my own house that is to say. You will never in all your life make music like that—it can't be; that is why I rejoice doubly for the numbers of your opera which you promise me and for which I am most eager. In a week I go to the Festival at Düsseldorf, where the 'Messiah' is to be given on the first day; on the second the 'Eroica,' the Beethoven C major Mass, an overture and my 42d psalm; and on the third Gluck's 'Alceste' in the theater, with costumes and all. There are to be singers from Berlin, and they will make the last (evidently the best) practicable. The Festival is at Whit'suntide again. Afterward we are to be at the wedding of my sister-in-law, Julie Jean Renaud, who is going to marry a young Schunk from here; after that we stay on in Frankfort for a time, then spend a fortnight with my uncle on the Rhine—and my castles in the air go no further. Now this letter is really done; it's quite absurdly long; many, many remembrances to your mother, and also to Mlle. S., and write to me very soon, dear Ferdinand; your letters are such a pleasure to me. Always your

FELIX.

"My wife and child are well and beg to be remembered to you."
"My dear Friend:—Your brother says I am to put in a word for you into his letter. Everything here, every day, every walk through the town and in the woods recalls you to me so strongly, that I ought long ago to have written you a proper letter of my own, and I mean to very shortly. I should like to write to you about all Frankfort, but that is just what keeps me from writing. So today I only send you and your dear mother my remembrances and best wishes. We are all well, and so is your brother and also your sister-in-law on the sofa in the next room. Your portrait over the sofa is like, after all, though rather atrociously painted, but it is well conceived. Yes, if only you were here yourself. All your friends here remember you most affectionately, I can tell you, and all wish for you back again. It's to be hoped the oratorio will soon come now, and you with it, which will be far nicer than this letter paper and the hundred miles of separation. Farewell for today, you dear friend and musician; next time I shall write to you properly: forgive my haste and be a little fond of your

"Frankfort, 16th August, 1839.

"My dear Friend:—On returning here from Horchheim I find your letter from Basle, with the second part of the oratorio, and glancing quickly over it in the bustle of travelling-preparations, I am struck by so many and such great beauties in it, that I can't help telling you so to-day, though in few words, and thanking you for the great pleasure and enjoyment you have given me with it. This second part seems to me far superior to the first in every respect, and whenever I look I find splendid touches, quite peculiar to you. What I like best of all is the A major chorus with the solo and the repetition—the miso tavo, and the vigorous opening are new and capital; one expects something quite different, and not nearly so fine. And then the first chorus, and the war march in C major, and the entrance of the chorus in the recitative, and the one in F minor, and in fact the whole thing. It seems to me that the poet has again now and then missed a point; but why should I begin criticising again, when there is so much to surprise and delight me beyond my expectation? I promise you not to open my mouth again, at least not till I get your answer, which will be very soon I hope, and till I know that you are not angry with me for opening it so enormously wide already. Write soon, dear Ferdinand, and thanks, thanks, thanks for all this good and beautiful music.

"Some letter of yours to me must have been lost. You write that you should perhaps hear from me at Bern, and I had no idea of your Swiss journey, and was quite perplexed by your dating from Basle. How shameful it is that we were so near together, both on the Rhine, and now again so far from one another! And yet it is quite right that you should be in Italy again, and that you should not let yourself be disturbed in your wishes and doings. Tomorrow I go back to Leipsic, where I hope to hear from you soon. My wife and child are well and send messages to you and your mother and I do the same with all my heart. Now I must be off.

"I like your having put 'Rigikulm, Midnight,' at the end of the 'Destruction of Jerusalem;' but the C major is still better, and the A major opening is the most beautiful of all, and so Ferdinand, best thanks to you, my dear friend. Always your Felix."

I had taken my dear mother and her companion to Basle, because the state of her health made it necessary for her to take the baths at Wiesbaden. Nevertheless, after a few weeks she became so ill that I hastened home. I received the following after I had written to Mendelssohn from Frankfort about the anxieties which troubled me:

"Leipsic, 19th September, 1839.

"Dear Ferdinand:—I need hardly tell you how your yesterday's letter saddened me; you know what heartfelt sympathy I take in you and in your welfare. May God restore your dear mother to complete health and give comfort and happiness to you all. I can well imagine your anxiety and sadness at present; dear Ferdinand, if only I were with you! Even though I might not be able to help, I could perhaps divert your thoughts a little; have I not also felt from the bottom of my heart, how at such moments all art and poetry and everything else that is dear and precious to us, seem so empty and comfortless, so hateful and paltry, and the only thought that does one any good is, 'Oh, that God would help.' When you have a spare moment, do write me a line to say how she is: we should so much like to hear from you as often as possible—write me a line at least every week; I shall be so impatient for it.

"I send off the first part of the oratorio by to-day's post. I have not quite done with the second, so I had not written to you in Italy about it. I shall send it to-morrow or the day after, and then write to you properly and fully. Let us hear from you again directly. My wife sends best remembrances. Your Felix M.B."

My dear mother was not able to resist the illness which had attacked her, and died on the 22nd of September.
CHAPTER VI.

Leipsic. (Winter of 1839-40.)

"Leipsic, 29th September, 1839.

My Dear Friend:—No words are needed to tell you how deeply I grieve for you in this great sorrow of yours. You know how I sympathize with you in everything which concerns you, whether it be good or bad, even in the nearest trifles; how much more so then in the greatest loss which could befall you! Any one who knew your dear mother in the very least, or had ever seen you together, must know what an irreparable blank is made in your life and your heart by her death. But why should I say all this to you? I would so much rather be with you, so that we might have a quiet time together, and I might try and if possible help you to bear this bitter trial. Even that I can not do; and besides, just at first, neither sympathy, nor words of comfort, nor even friends, can do one any good,—when they try their very best, they may only do harm, and certainly can not help or be of any use; only God and one's sense of duty can do that. But what I wanted to write to you about was suggested to me by the last words in your letter, where you say that you must stay in Frankfort for the present on account of business matters; when these are over, could u't you come to us for a little? Would not the change of surroundings, the affectionate and hearty welcome which you are sure of from all the musicians here, the separation from a place which though now doubly dear to you must also be doubly sad, do you good, and if not cheer you, at least distract your thoughts now and then? I do not mean now directly, but I was thinking of the end of next month, and November; my journey to Vienna is as good as given up, so I can offer you a nice, warm, pretty room, which we would make as comfortable as possible for you. Cecile joins with me in my request, and we hope you will fulfill our wish.

I don't speak of how well we could talk over the oratorio together, and all that we might do toward arranging for the performance, nor of all the music that I should hope to make you enjoy. Today I only wish to impress upon you how much I want you to spend the next month in different surroundings and with friends who are as fond of you as we are.
"How entirely our whole future rests always, and every day, in God's hands! My Cecile is expecting her confinement in the next few weeks, and if one is to speak of the cares of married life, I as yet only know those which at such a time engross me every hour and minute, and leave me no peace for any other thought. Thank Heaven, she is so well and strong, that I hope God will continue to grant her health and happiness—and so with a sanguine heart I repeat my request and our invitation to you. Farewell for today, my dear, dear friend; try and keep up, and may Heaven give you courage and strength!

Always your
F. M."

In the course of the next month this affectionate letter was followed by another similar to it, with these words: "Your room is ready for you, with a piano in it, and you shall be as undisturbed as you like, and a good deal disturbed too. My Cecile sends you her remembrances and joins most heartily in my request; so do come and try perfect rest and our quiet homely life for a time, and let me hope to see you very soon." It was impossible to resist such an invitation, so I set off as soon as I could manage it. I stopped at Weimar to pay a visit to the widow of my revered master, Hummel, for she had always been like a mother to me. There I found the following lines from my thoughtful friend:

"Leipsic, 3rd December, 1839.

"Dear Ferdinand:—As there was no time after receiving your dear and welcome lines, to write to you at Frankfort, I send this to Weimar, in the hope that you may get it immediately on arriving. I live in Lurgenstein's garden, the first house on the left, on the second floor. I should like to know whether you travel in your own carriage, or by post, so that, in the first case, I might secure a place for your carriage. Write me two lines from Weimar to say when you are coming, and if possible tell me the exact time of your arrival here, or your departure from there, then I can go and meet you on the road. I need not tell you how much my wife and I look forward to seeing you, you dear friend. For the last three weeks all our friends, and all the friends of music, have kept on asking me, 'When is Hiller coming?' and I have often had to tell them of your resolution to keep quiet, so they might not be too eager in their demands. Now good-by till we meet! Your Felix."
Mendelssohn and David met me at the place where the coach stopped and gave me the warmest of welcomes. In the course of the first few days I was introduced to Mendelssohn's relations and friends, and soon felt as if I had belonged to that delightful circle for years. Mendelssohn's house was pleasantly situated, with a nice open outlook from the front upon the Leipziger boulevard, and the St. Thomas school and church, once the sphere of the great Bach's labors. The arrangement of the rooms was as follows: First, a sort of hall, with the dining-table and a few chairs; to the right of this a large sitting-room and some bedrooms; to the left my friend's study, with his piano. Opening out of this was a fine large drawing-room, which, however, was robbed of some of its natural elegance by the bed which had been put there for me, though this was counteracted by a piano, also put there for my use.

Our way of life was regular and simple. At about eight we breakfasted on coffee and bread and butter. Butter, Felix never eat, but broke his bread into his coffee like any schoolboy, "as he had been accustomed to do." We dined at one, and though he despised butter, he always liked a glass of good wine, and we often had to try some special sort, which he would produce with great delight, and swallow with immense satisfaction. We generally made quick work of our dinner, but in the evenings after supper we used often to sit round the table for hours chatting (not smoking), unless we moved to the pianino which had been presented to Madame Mendelssohn by the directors of the Gewandhaus.

The first days were taken up with paying and receiving visits, and passed quickly enough. My next thought was to resume my work. I had a performance of my oratorio in prospect, and there was still a great deal to be done toward it. "We must sit and compose at the same table together," said Mendelssohn one morning, "and let's begin at once to-day."

The following day was "Liedertafel," by which I must not be supposed to mean one of those huge societies formed in the last forty years to assist the love of the "Vaterland" and of wine and women. A dozen thorough musicians, some of whom to this day represent the most zealous supporters of music in Leipzig, used to meet from time to time, and did all honor to their title, for their table was no less excellent than their songs.* Mendelssohn thought it would be great fun if we set the same words to music, and let the singers guess which was which. No sooner said than done. We looked through several volumes of poetry and soon agreed in the choice of a song of Eichendorff's. I can still see us sitting opposite one another, dipping our pens into the same inkstand, the silence only broken at rare intervals by some joke or other, and the piano not once touched. In writing out the parts, each copied half of his own composition and half of the other's. The scores were not to appear, and above all the secret was on no account to be betrayed to the members of the "Liedertafel."

The evening arrived, and the thing was a complete success. The songs were sung at sight in capital style, and only one of the singers, Dr. Schieinitz, one of the most accomplished of living amateurs, gave his opinion, with thorough conviction,—and was right. None of the others could make up their minds. We laughed and—held our tongues.

Mendelssohn afterward apologized to me—very unnecessarily—for having let out the secret by publishing his song.† I then published mine in a Swiss collection, to which I had been asked to contribute—I forget the title of it, and where it appeared,—but the origin of this little piece was always a charming recollection to me.

Though I had felt no difficulty in throwing off a simple song in my friend's presence, it was quite different with more serious work. It was impossible for me to feel at my ease at the piano, with the consciousness that every idea had a listener—and such a one! Besides, I afterward discovered, by chance, that Mendelssohn too did not like his communings with his genius to be overheard. How could it have been otherwise! Still, I found it extremely difficult, in the midst of all the kindness and affection which surrounded me, to come forward with the announcement, that, delightful as was our way of life, it must come to a stop. After many discussions, I at last got permission to look out for a lodging close by, on the condition that I should only work and sleep there, and to our general satisfaction we found one within a few steps. They were the same rooms in Reichel's garden which Mendelssohn had inhabited in his bachelor days. So, after about a fortnight at my friend's house, I moved into my new quarters.

We had had a tolerable quantity of music, however, during this time. Mendelssohn had just finished his great D minor trio, and played it to me. I was tremendously impressed by the fire and spirit, the flow, and, in short, the masterly character of the whole thing. But I had one small misgiving. Certain pianoforte passages in it, constructed on broken chords, seemed to me—to speak candidly—somewhat old-fashioned. I had lived many years in Paris, seeing Liszt frequently and Chopin every day, so that I was thoroughly accustomed to the richness of passages which marked the new pianoforte school. I made some observations to Mendelssohn on this point, suggesting certain alterations, but at first he would not listen to me. "Do you think that that would make the thing any better?" he said; "the piece would be the same, and so it may remain as it is." "But," I answered, "you have often told me, and proved to me by your actions, that the smallest touch of the brush which might conduce to the perfection of the whole, must not be despised. An unusual form of arpeggio may not improve the harmony, but neither does it spoil it—and it becomes more interesting to the player. We discussed it and tried it on the piano over and over again, and I enjoyed the small triumph of at last getting Mendelssohn over to my view. Seriously and conscientiously as he took everything when once he had made up his mind about it, he now undertook the lengthy, not to say wearisome task, of rewriting the whole pianoforte part. One day, when I found him working at it, he played me a bit which he had worked out exactly as I had suggested to him, on the piano, and called out to me, "That is to remain as a remembrance of you." Afterward, when he had been playing it at a chamber-concert with all his wonderful fire, and had carried away the whole public with it, he said, "I really enjoy that piece; it is honest music after all, and the players will like it, because they can show off with it." And so it proved.

In the course of that winter I witnessed a curious example of that almost morbid conscientiousness of Mendelssohn's with regard to the possible perfection of his compositions. One evening I came into his room, and found him looking so heated, and in such a feverish state of excitement, that I was frightened. "What's the matter with you?" I called out. "There I have been sitting for the last four hours," he said, "trying to alter a few bars in a song (it was a quartet for men's voices) and can't do it."

He had made twenty different versions, the greater number of which would have satisfied most people. "What you could not do today in four hours," said I, "you will be able to do tomorrow in as many minutes." He calmed down by degrees, and we got into such earnest conversation that I stayed with him till a late hour. Next day I found him in unusually good spirits, and he said to me, "Yesterday evening when you were gone I was so excited that it was no use thinking of sleep, so at last I composed a little hunting-song, which I must play you at once." He sat down to the piano, and I heard the song, which has since delighted hundreds and thousands of people, namely, Eichendorf's "Sei gegrüsst du schöner Wald!" I hailed it with joyful surprise.

Musical life in Leipzig, which has always been extremely active, had certainly gained an extraordinary impetus through Mendelssohn's personal influence and energy. His eminent talent as a conductor was especially favorable to the performance of orchestral works. Even if before his time vigorous leaders, by the help of their fiddling, had made them go with spirit and precision, no one had ever imagined such deep conception, or such artistic finish in the performances of the great symphonies. It was a capital orchestra altogether, though the only example of extraordinary talent in it was Ferdinand David, who followed the conductor with his whole soul, and carried the quartet along with him. Having for many years attended the (wrongly so-called*) Conservatoire concerts in Paris, I was naturally at first much struck by the contrast to these, especially in the wind, and the general tone and effect. At that time the Leipzig Conservatorium was not yet founded, and it was only afterward that the Gewandhaus orchestra gained such material and brilliant reinforcements from Davide's pupils. But all the little drawbacks in individual execution were thrown into the background by the spirit and life which Mendelssohn instilled into the orchestra, his complete devotion to the cause, and the delight which at every successful achievement lit up his expressive features, and acted like electricity upon the public. When I speak of his conducting thus influencing the audience, it must not be supposed that he in any way courted the notice of the public by his behavior at the desk. His movements were short and decided, and generally hardly visible, for he turned his right side to the orchestra. A mere glance at the first fiddle, a slight look one way or the other, was sufficient. It was the sympathy in the cause, which gathered strength from the sympathy brought to bear on it by so wonderful a man.

Symphonies and overtures were then as now the prominent feature in the Leipzig programmes. It is well known what a ready welcome Mendelssohn had for any composers whose works in any way deserved it. Thus, in that winter, or rather in the second half of it, many novelties were produced. Kalliwoda conducted one of his symphonies (in B minor), which met with a very favorable reception. Kitt's "Jagd-Symphonie," which had been given in Paris with some success, was performed in the presence of the composer, who introduced himself as a humble amateur. We also had one by the composer of the "Last Judgment," the old Dessauer, as Frederick Schneider was often called. Schubert's great C major symphony made such a powerful impression that it was put down in the programme a second time. However, it had hardly begun when the public took fright at a false alarm of fire, and fled. Afterward it was played at the end of the last concert, with much fire, and no alarm. I also heard there, for the first and last time in my life, a symphony by Vogler. Among the overtures, Rietz's in A major especially deserves mention, having become one of the best known works of that composer. I happened to be with Mendelssohn at the moment when he got the score. He had known this excellent composition at Düsseldorf, and was greatly delighted with the successful alterations which had been made in it, probably by his own advice. He soon found a publisher for it, and was immensely excited at being able to send the news to Rietz in his musical solitude at Düsseldorf. At one of the first concerts which I went to, a half-improvised performance of the four Leonora-Fidelio overtures took place. The first and second were in the programme—the latter, then unpublished, being given for the first time; it was received with great enthusiasm, and encored, upon which Mendelssohn gave the third, the greatest and best known; and later in the concert, some instrumental solo having been omitted, he also gave the fourth, the overture to "Fidelio," in E. This wonderfully interesting conjunction of these four masterpieces was all the more charming for its not having been prearranged.

Among his choral works I must specially mention the splendid psalm, "When Israel out of Egypt came," the first performance of which took place on New Year's Day in 1840. The first movements of it are certainly among the noblest of Mendelssohn's compositions, and will always hold their own against the most important things which our art has produced. Neither the novelty of the work nor the presence of the composer could add to its merit, but they certainly heightened the impression, and it need not be said that its reception was enthusiastic. I also have a very vivid remembrance of the performance of a capital finale from Cherubini's "Abencerrages." Mendelssohn had taken great pains to get it from the directors of the Berlin Opera.

The solo vocal music at a great number of the concerts was sustained by a charming young Belgian lady, Mlle. Elise Mevert, and later on by the well-known Sophie Schloss. All manner of cava-tinas out of unknown Italian operas (which the public of course enjoyed extremely) had to be scored for the Gewandhaus concerts, and to our great delight were so well done by a very clever copyist that they only required slight revision from Mendelssohn before performance. We used often secretly to chuckle over some of the rather bold orchestral effects which our poor copyist, at sixpence a sheet, had successfully ventured upon.

The instrumental solos were endless, and many of them capital.
Mendelssohn played his D minor Concerto for the first time; David and Ernst, Eckert (now capellmeister at Berlin), Kalliwoda, and many others, contributed violin solos. One of the pianoforte performances I must mention, because of, or rather in spite of, my having a share in it. Felix and I were to play Mozart’s E flat Concerto for two pianos, and had prepared the cadenzas for the first movement in the following manner: I was to begin extemporising and make a pause on some chord of the seventh; Mendelssohn was then to continue from there, and pause on another chord which we had fixed upon; for the finish he had written a few pages for both instruments together, now relieving one another, now uniting, till the tutti. The thing succeeded perfectly, and the audience, most of whom could not make out how we had managed it, applauded enthusiastically.

There were, besides, performances on the cello, the clarinet, the horn, the bassoon, the trombone, and even the musical glasses.
The public were much more tolerant about such things at that time than now, when the pianoforte, the violin, and cello have almost exclusive command of the concert-rooms. No doubt this is advantageous to the programmes, but by no means so to the orchestras, as it entirely deprives the wind-instrument players of the opportunity of gaining a little extra honor and extra pay. Thus it has come about that our much-vaunted improvement in executive music can only be called real with respect to the string instruments.
And the preference which in modern music is given to the brass is likely to make the performance of works by the old masters more and more difficult. But I am digressing, and must return to Leipzig.

The interest of the Quartet-Evenings which Ferdinand David had carried on for some years past was greatly heightened this winter by Mendelssohn's co-operation. He often played at them, and his rendering of Mozart's and Beethoven's compositions was incomparably beautiful. We also sometimes played four-hand things, and especially made a great sensation with Mozart's Variations in G. But what I remember most distinctly was Mendelssohn's playing of Bach's Chromatic Fantasia. It was quite overwhelming, and he was obliged to go back to the piano. He then improvised, combining in the cleverest way a theme of Bach's with his own well-known "Song without Words" in E (No. 1, Bk. 1)—thus uniting past and present into something new and difficult to describe. David was no less many-sided in his way. Besides the three great quartet writers, he favored us with Spohr, Onslow, Mendelssohn, as well as Schubert, then little known as a quartet composer. I must also make particular mention of the fact that this winter he brought before the public the Chaconne of Bach, since so much played. Mendelssohn accompanied it ad libitum on the piano, and the thing made a great impression. The public were also immensely delighted one evening to see Mendelssohn and Kalliwoda playing the violins in Spohr's double quartet and Mendelssohn's octet. Mendelssohn never touched a stringed instrument the whole year round; but, if wanted, he could do it, as he could so many other things.

Nor must I forget, for the sake of that clever artist's friends, that during this winter young Verulam, who was in some measure a pupil of Mendelssohn's, earned his first spurs as conductor of the "Euterpe" concerts. At these he gave a number of very promising large choral works of his own composition.

This winter was remarkable for the appearances of some of the most brilliant players. First of all, Ernst, then at the summit of his talent, and enchanting the whole world. Mendelssohn was very fond of him. Ernst told me one day, almost with emotion, how at the time of his concerts in the Königstädt Theater, at Berlin, he was very much pressed one morning, in Mendelssohn's presence, to put down his "Elégie" in the programme again, though he had played it I don't know how many times. When Mendelssohn also began urging him to do it, Ernst answered, in fun, "If you will accompany me, I will;" and Mendelssohn in fact made his appearance on the "Königstädt" stage, accompanied the "Elégie," and disappeared. It was not only their beloved violins which united David and Ernst, but also the beloved game of whist. I certainly believe that neither of them ever played the violin so late into the night as they did whist. It was harmless enough, and good and bad jokes played just as great a part in it as the cards.

Toward the spring, Liszt arrived in Leipzig, fresh from his triumphs at Vienna and Prague, and revolutionized the quiet town. It will be remembered that in Paris he had excited Mendelssohn's highest admiration. At his first concert, as he glided along the platform of the orchestra to the piano, dressed in the most elegant fashion, and as lithe and slender as a tiger-cat, Mendelssohn said to me, "There's a novel apparition—the virtuoso of the nineteenth century." I need hardly describe the impression made by his playing. When he played Schubert's "Erkönig," half the people stood on their chairs. The Lucia-Fantasie turned everybody's head. With some other pieces, however, he was less successful; for instance, with Mendelssohn's D minor Concerto, which had just appeared, and which he could neither read at sight nor find time to study with any care, so that people thought that the composer played it better himself. His performance of a part of the Pastoral Symphony, in the same room where it had so often been heard with all its orchestral effects, also did not meet with general approval.

In the preface to his arrangement of the Beethoven Symphonies, Liszt boldly declares that every effect can be reproduced on the modern piano. When Mendelssohn read this, he said, "Well, if I could only hear the first eight bars of Mozart's G minor Symphony, with that delicate figure in the tenors, rendered on the piano as it sounds in the orchestra—I would believe it."
It may easily be imagined that Liszt was fitted to the very utmost Mendelssohn arranged a grand soirée at the Gewandhaus, to which upward of two hundred people were invited. It was partly a conversazione, partly a concert. I had the honor of taking part in a performance of Bach's concerto for three pianos. I myself entertained Liszt at a rather solemn dinner on the first floor of a fashionable hotel, and invited all the heads of the musical societies in the place to meet him. Some time afterward, when we were talking over these heroic social deeds of ours, Mendelssohn was infinitely amused at hearing that my somewhat obscure fête, which had included such a small number of people, cost me much more than his grand demonstration. He had such a childishly naive and good-natured way of laughing at anything of that sort, and really was never so pleasant as when he could be making a little fun of something or other.

At the last of the Gewandhaus concerts, I conducted my oratorio, the "Destruction of Jerusalem." I had sent Mendelssohn a finished sketch of it in the foregoing summer, and he at once took the warmest interest in it. It was certainly owing to his influence that, though the score was not yet even written, the oratorio should have been accepted for performance by the directors of the concerts. In the putting together of the words there was a great deal with which we were neither of us satisfied. One day he took the book of words home with him, and surprised me in the kindest way on Christmas Eve with a fresh and complete copy of it. I need not explain how useful his severe critical remarks were to my composition. One day, when I thanked him, he said, "I only show you what you would have found out for yourself in a few months." The oratorio had a very warm reception; but what gave me most pleasure was Mendelssohn's entire satisfaction. He sat amongst the audience with Cécile, and told me what pleasure he had felt, not only in my music, but also in the correct judgment of his wife, who had always picked out the best things. He also admitted that the work had a very peculiar coloring, and I only refer to this now because it has sometimes been spoken of as an imitation of the "Elijah," which was only completed six years later.

In the course of that winter, Mendelssohn published a number of things, and amongst others his D minor trio. He went on correcting and altering it up to the last minute, and many of the plates had to be engraved over again. He also composed a good many new things. But what occupied him most of all was the "Hymn of Praise," which he had undertaken to compose for the celebration of the discovery of printing, in June, 1840. How he managed to work in the midst of so many distractions it would be difficult to imagine but for his wonderful mental equanimity. In general, he was completely master of his powers, though I do not mean to say that he could or would have composed at any moment; but he certainly often did so, when one would least have expected it.

"When I go into a painter's studio," he once said to me, "I am often envious. It must be too nice to live all day entirely for one's work, as they do. But our independent way of spending our time has a great charm about it, too." Of this independence he made the greatest use, and probably never spent his time alike two days running. One afternoon I found him particularly cheerful, and he said to me, "I have had such a satisfactory morning: I have been playing a great deal—all sorts of people's music, and yours, too; and I have also been composing and writing. I mean to do this every day now." And yet he hardly managed to do it a second time. It was his correspondence which actually took up most of his time. He must have written an incredible number of letters. But it was a pleasure to him to be in such general requisition, and he never complained of it. Everything he did he strove to do in the most perfect manner possible, down to the smallest details; and it was the same with his correspondence. It was delightful to watch him folding up a letter with the utmost care, and sealing it with evident satisfaction. Anyhow, he could always be certain of giving pleasure with it. Whatever hard work he had before him, it never prevented him from occupying himself with something else up to the last minute. How often, when I called for him to go to a concert where he had to play and conduct, I would find him, in full dress, sitting quietly at the writing-table. It was just because he felt so secure in all that he did.

"How would you translate this?" he asked me one evening, and then read me a line out of one of Dante's sonnets. His uncle Joseph (the eldest son of Moses Mendelssohn, who dedicated his "Morgenstunden" to him), a very highly gifted man, and devoted to his latest years to study and self-culture, had sent him several of Dante's sonnets, from the "Vita Nuova," begging him to translate them for him in the form of the original. The nephew set to work with feverish eagerness, and, as far as I could judge, succeeded admirably. But, after all, he got more vexation than pleasure from it; for the old gentleman, with an uncle's want of consideration, had meanwhile made use of some other version, and Felix did not even get a word of thanks, whereat he greatly complained. I take this opportunity of saying, that I feel sure that Felix must have written a considerable number of lyrical poems, though I do not know if he told his friends of it. If this be true, we may surely hope that a future time may bring them to light. They would certainly not be without some merit. Another partly literary work, which occupied my friend for some time, was an address to the king of Saxony. A sum of 20,000 thalers had been bequeathed to the king by a Leipzig gentleman, with the request that he would devote it to some artistic purpose. In conjunction with Von Falkenstein, then "Kreis director," now minister, Mendelssohn drew up a plan for the organization of a conservatorium, to which he added an entreaty that the king would devote the money to the foundation of the institution. It is well known that the Leipzig Conservatorium was opened in the year 1843; that Mendelssohn labored enthusiastically for it, and that this school contributed greatly to the progress of musical life in Leipzig. It was equally Mendelssohn's doing that Hauptmann and Moscheles were appointed to posts there.

One evening I found Felix deep in the Bible. "Listen," he said; and then he read to me, in a gentle and agitated voice, the passage from the first book of Kings, beginning with the words, "And behold, the Lord passed by." "Would not that be splendid for an oratorio?" he exclaimed; and it did become part of the "Elijah."

In the midst of the manifold occupations and social meetings which he gladly took part in, and which he graced by his talent and his brilliant conversation, there would come days of exhaustion, even of depression. At such times, visits from his friends, foremost among whom were David and Dr. Schleinitz, would always do him good. Sometimes, also, he would amuse himself with doing little water-color sketches; or he would read some poem of Goethe's—for instance, "Hermann and Dorothea" or "Iphigenia." The first of these he was especially fond of, and he would go into raptures over the deep feeling which penetrates the most insignificant things in this wonderful work. He said, one day, that the line, "Und es lobte darauf der Apotheker den Knäster," was enough to bring tears into one's eyes. He would also get out Jean Paul sometimes, and revel in his humor. One evening he read aloud to me out of Siebenkäs for at least an hour. But sleep was always his best cure.
Several times I found him lying on the sofa before dinner, ready dressed, having been asleep for hours, after which he would awake with a capital appetite. A quarter of an hour after, he would say, with the air of a spoiled child, "I am still quite tired," would lie down again, saying how delicious it was, stretch himself out, and in a few minutes be fast asleep again. "He can go on in that way for two days," Cécile said tome, "and then he is fresher than ever."
Nature supplied him with the best cure; but, unhappily, it could not remain so always.

For his birthday, we arranged a joke with which he was immensely delighted. The first occasion for it arose from the fact that his wife and her sister and myself were of the same nation, the free town of Frankfort being our common native-place. I wrote a little piece, or rather a couple of scenes, in Frankfort dialect, giving myself the part of the now typical "Hampelmann." *

* "Hampelmann" is the name of the typical Frankfortburger, a favorite character in farce.
Madame Mendelssohn was to represent my wife, and her sister my daughter. The story was somewhat slight, and ran as follows: Fräulein Hampelmann is a very passionate lover of music, and in the first scene expresses a great wish to have pianoforte lessons from the celebrated Mendelssohn in Leipsic. After much discussion, the papa is gained over, and the family prepare for the journey.
The second scene opens in Mendelssohn’s study, where he was represented by David, with inimitable drollery. The costume was true to life, being the very coat which Mendelssohn wore at home, and he managed in all sorts of delightful ways to caricature our friend’s movements and manner of speaking. The Hampelmann family are introduced to him, and very politely received. After some conversation, Fräulein Hampelmann is made to play, and then Mendelssohn is at last induced to improvise, and this David did in the funniest way, imitating Mendelssohn in his movements more than in his thoughts. Finally, this good-natured, but not very artistic, family is sent home again in the most civil manner possible. I had made the Hampelmann ladies, in their excessively limited knowldge of musical matters, say all manner of malicious things, which were taken up as agreeably as they were harmlessly meant.

When our life had become a little quieter, so that we often spent the evenings at home, Mendelssohn proposed that we should improvisate on given poems. We read and played in turns, each declaiming for the other, and found it a most amusing and exciting pastime. Heaven only knows how many poems of Schiller, Goethe, and Uhland had to serve us for musical illustrations. After one of my improvisations, Mendelssohn said to me, “I can’t imagine how you can ever for a moment feel any doubt about your musical gifts;” and these words often afterward, in sad moments, rung with consolation in my ears. During my subsequent stay in Dresden, I had the opportunity of continuing this practice with my friend, Edward Devrient, who perhaps declaimed better than any one else, certainly more musically. In this way, we could give great pleasure; and, as an amusing social diversion, I have often, even up to the present time, amused myself over this game with some friend or other, and it always recalls the happy times when we first began it. We had many serious conversations together that winter, and I very much regret that I did not note down some of my friend’s sayings. But when one is living in affluence, one does not easily think of putting by. A few things which I happen to remember may find room here. After the performance of a most prosaic symphony, which met with a very cold reception, he said to me: “We have successfully conquered the Philistines now, but it remains to be seen whether our art be not still more threatened from the opposite direction.” Once, when I was speaking of the happiness that lay in the conviction of so many people whom one highly esteemed being kindly disposed toward one, he grew very warm upon the subject, and said: “It is certainly the best thing that one has. When I am thoroughly dissatisfied with myself, I think of such and such a person who has shown himself a friend to me, and say to myself, ‘You can’t be in such a bad way, after all, if such men are fond of you.’” One day, speaking of his adherents and his opponents, he said that he could perfectly understand that certain musicians, who took up a very stern line, considered him half a deserter, and so many of those of his compositions which met with most favor must appear to them frivolous, compared to former ones, so that they might say he had forsaken his better style. With all the earnestness of his character, it was especially disagreeable to him when people treated serious things with exaggeration. “I had a visit from a Belgian author, this morning,” he told me, a few hours later: “He has an astoundingly flow of talk, and said several good things. But when he was gone, and I began to think it over, I found that it might have been expressed much better in the very simplest way; therefore, why use such big words? why want to appear so deep?” It is this simplicity, always exemplified in his works, which makes them appear shallow to those people who take bombastic nonsense for depth. There is no shallowness to be found in Mendelssohn’s works, but rather in those which are too shallow to contain the beauty of simplicity. Once, at dinner, when we were talking about Beaumarchais’ comedies, which he greatly admired, he said, "One really ought to have Beaumarchais;" so I got it for him, and wrote inside it, "One really ought to have Beaumarchais (Mendelssohn's table-talk)."

One peculiarity of his, which I have already alluded to, was his way of suddenly jumping to something very comic or very serious in the midst of a quiet conversation. One afternoon, when we were lounging about in the promenades, he turned upon me all at once with the question: "Do you believe in the progress of humanity?" "How, in what way do you mean?" I said, with some surprise. "Well," he answered, "I don't speak of machines, and railways, and all those things; but I ask if you think that mankind becomes better and more remarkable as time goes on?" I do not now remember what conclusion we came to.

It was always from the way in which he had been taught that he drew his reasons for everything which he did or did not do. In his scores for choruses, he used the C clef, keeping the alto part also in the soprano clef. This rather bothered me, and I once reproached him for the inconsistency of such a proceeding, upon which he answered: "You are perfectly right, but it is not my fault. It was Zelter's way, and I accustomed myself to it from the very first." His lovely musical handwriting he said he owed to his friend Rietz, the violinist, who died young, and was the elder brother of Julius Rietz, the concertmeister. He sometimes told me about his studies with Zelter, and how they were generally carried on peripatetically in the garden behind his father's house. What he told me of them confirmed me in the opinion which Marx expressed as follows: "When Zelter became Mendelssohn's master, he merely put a fish into the water, and let it swim away as it liked." With all his love for his old master, the remembrance of the following fact always made him angry. Some years before Felix's birth, his father, who was a friend of Zelter's, gave the latter a great quantity of Bach's Cantatas in the original manuscripts; and when Felix became his pupil, Zelter used sometimes to take him to the closet where these treasures were stored up, and show them to him, saying, "There they are; just think of all that is hidden in there!" But poor Felix, though he thirsted for these costly treasures, was never once allowed to look inside them, and taste them. Anyhow, these things would have been better cared for in Mendelssohn's hands than in Zelter's.

Mendelssohn was very fond of repeating any funny expression or word over and over again, till it became a joke. As in former years he had amused himself with calling me "Old Drama," so now, during this winter, for a long time, he always addressed me with the words, "Hail, Zedekiah!" out of a chorus from the "Destruction of Jerusalem." Or else it would be a passage out of some pianoforte piece which he liked, and which he would always be bringing up again, and playing to me when it was furthest from my thoughts.

I also have pleasant recollections of the walks which we often took with David, on clear, cold days, far out into the Rosenthal. We used to stop at one of the cafés there, and Mendelssohn would indulge in his latest, but, as I believe, very passing, passion for billiards. Whether he was as clever at that as at anything else, I could not judge, for though I lived for years in the land of billiards, I knew nothing of the game.

It may seem strange that I should not have mentioned Schumann, whom Mendelssohn thought so highly of, but at that time he lived in greater retirement than usual, and hardly ever left his room. His paper, his songs, but, above all, his future marriage with Clara Wieck, completely occupied him; his bride came but seldom to Leipzig that winter, but a few years afterward, at Dresden, I enjoyed a great deal of pleasant and intimate intercourse with the famous pair.

Every one knows how happy Mendelssohn was at home. His beautiful, gentle, sensible wife spread a charm over the whole household, and reminded one of a Raphael Madonna. Little Carl, the eldest child, amused us intensely with his first attempts at speaking. Cécile's family, charming people, were in and out all day, and the whole atmosphere was a sort of rivalry of amiability and affection—it was altogether a period of happiness which falls to the share of but few mortals. We laughed much when Cécile told us how, as she came out of a concert at the Gewandhaus, she had heard two women close by her talking about her, and pitying her because "her husband was so cruel, inhuman, and barbarous to her!"

All this time, though I was very much occupied with my work, and looking forward with anxiety to the first performance of the oratorio, I could feel and enjoy to the utmost the happiness which Mendelssohn's affection and esteem imparted to me. And, at last, when my labors were crowned by an entirely unbiased success, the concluding days of my stay in Leipsic became some of the happiest in my life. On the 2d of April, 1840, the "Destruction of Jerusalem" was performed for the first time at a concert given at the Gewandhaus for the benefit of the poor. The chorus and orchestra were capital: Frau Liva Frege, whose lovely and expressive singing can never be forgotten by any who had the good fortune to hear her; Fräulein Sophie Schloss, with her fine sympathetic voice; the clever tenor, Schmidt, and a very cultivated amateur baritone, undertook the solos. The audience was most enthusiastic, and next morning the amiable publisher, Kistner, secured the work as his property—what more could I want? I returned full of gratitude to my native town, which I had left with such a sad heart, and from there went on to Italy, where my bride awaited me.

Frankfort. (September, 1842.)

For this period, my chief authority is my journal, which, though short enough, I kept very regularly. Having spent the first winter after my marriage in Rome, I returned to Frankfort with my young wife in the summer of 1842, and was most kindly welcomed by my numerous friends, amongst whom I may reckon those connected with Mendelssohn by his wife. Felix came to Frankfort with his family in September, and stayed a fortnight. My wife had cultivated her beautiful soprano voice with great care in Italy, and had even been very successful on the stage for some months. Mendelssohn took the greatest interest in her musical gifts, and his short visit that autumn was like a musical spring to us. He generally spent half the day with us, and we used to meet him and his wife at parties nearly every evening. I had filled a thick blue music-book with songs of all sorts, German and Italian psalms, airs, and romances, which I had composed for my wife, and all of these Mendelssohn insisted on hearing; in fact, he never came to see us without asking for the blue book. Carl Müller, a clever painter, whose acquaintance we had made in Rome, happening to be in Frankfort just at that time, promised to do us a pencil sketch of Mendelssohn, if we could only get him to sit. At my wife's request, he consented to put himself into the painter's hands, on condition that she would sing to him meanwhile. Sixteen songs of various lengths completed the sitting, and this sketch with his autograph and the date of the 15th of September, is one of our greatest treasures.

A few days before his departure, he wrote in my wife's album a setting of the Volkslied—

"Es weiss und es rath es doch Keiner, Wie mir so wohl ist, so wohl!"— and painted underneath it a miniature map of Germany, so as to impress her new country on her mind. Next to the map, he drew a pair of yellow kid gloves, as a sign of his endeavor to attain the height of elegance. After his return to Leipzig, he continued his gallant behavior by writing her an Italian letter, which I shall give in its proper place.

At that time, he chiefly played to me the choruses from "Antigone." He delighted in recalling to mind the energetic way in which he had pushed forward and fixed the performance, in opposition to Tieck's hesitation and doubt, and, as usual in such cases, gave me amusing and graphic accounts of his little devices for getting round the famous old poet; he seemed to enjoy all this almost more than the beautiful work itself, which had taken him only just over a fortnight to compose. He had completed his great A minor symphony in the course of the summer, and was at work on a four-hand arrangement of it for the pianoforte, which he made haste to finish on my account. During his stay, we had invited our Frankfort acquaintances for the first time to a musical matinée; Felix completed the arrangement the evening before, and we began our music with this glorious work.

As usual, Mendelssohn's time was always entirely taken up, in some way or other, with music. Charles Hallé, who has since gained such a high artistic position in England, came to Frankfort with his charming wife during that fortnight. Being totally unknown there, the prospects of a concert which he intended giving were perhaps not so brilliant as his great talent deserved. So I persuaded Mendelssohn to help us, and we played Bach's Triple Concerto; in consequence, the room was crowded; everybody wanted to see Mendelssohn at the piano, and Hallé's success was complete.

Another day, he played on the organ at St. Catherine's church, and this, as may be imagined, attracted a great number of musical people. But I confess that even Mendelssohn's eminent talent, like that of so many other famous organists, left me quite cold, though I am far from attributing this to any want in their playing. I find it immensely interesting to stand by an organist and watch the motions of his hands and feet, whilst I follow on the music. But the excessive resonance in churches makes it more pain than pleasure to me to listen from below to any of those wonderful creations, with their manifold intricacies and brilliant passages. When I saw next to me so many cultivated musical people in the greatest delight, I was obliged to tell myself that the fault must lie in my imperfect musical organization. Or did they only show their delight because it was the correct thing to do? That also is possible. As an accompaniment to congregational singing, or for strengthening the harmony in oratorio choruses, the organ is indispensable, sublime, unique. But as a solo instrument I can only enjoy it when the greatest care is taken both in the choice and performance of such things as lie completely within its province. To make use of the organ for secular music is to misuse it; but many even of the great works written expressly for it, suitable as they may be in feeling, are not effective in a church. The organ is a queen who should only show herself when surrounded by her choicest state.

Mendelssohn was immensely excited whenever he played the organ, and indeed, even for musical organizations less highly developed than his, it must be most intoxicating to revel in that ocean of sound. Still, there is a gulf between making music and listening to it. He also accompanied us to the opera a few times, and I may here recall a gay remark of his as we were listening to a performance of the "Favorita" for the first time. In the opening scene, if I am not mistaken, there is a chorus of monks, which begins with an ascending scale, accompanied by the orchestra in rather an old-fashioned style. "Now they will sing the descending scale," said Felix; and he was right.

The young singers of Frankfort were determined again to do homage to the famous composer, and a great fête was given at the "Sandhoff" with part-songs, tableaux vivants, toasts, speeches, and the like. It was very pretty, though it had none of the poetry of the one which Mendelssohn so charmingly describes in a letter to his mother, 3d July, 1830. I was in Italy at the time, and was only represented by some of my songs which were sung. But I can not resist quoting a letter written by one of the ladies who helped to

"Everything went off beautifully, and it was just as if God had given His blessing to the whole affair. Mendelssohn seems not to have been able to wait till the time fixed, for he and his lovely young wife arrived much too early. But he adapted himself to the situation with the greatest good humor, and watched the preparations for his reception with infinite delight. I have never seen such a perfectly happy being as he was when he heard his quartets sung for the first time in the wood. His whole face beamed, his eyes literally sparkled with pleasure, and he was so excited that he actually danced about on one leg, calling out after each song, 'Again, again, please, once more!' We had to do the 'Lark's song' three times running with all the repeats."

It was in consequence of this fête that he dedicated the first book of his "Part Songs for the Open Air" to Dr. Spiess and Herr Martin, two very musical gentlemen who had greatly helped in the preparation of the party.

On the 25th Mendelssohn went to Leipsic, and then to Berlin. It was only twenty years afterward that I learned from the published collection of some of his letters in 1863 what a truly friendly action he had done for me during that very time. Amongst these letters I discovered one to Simrock, the publisher in Bonn, in favor of some one whom the editors of the letters discreetly designate as "X." There was no doubt about my being this unknown quantity; and having revealed the secret, I can not resist letting the letter appear in print again, for it displays such a wonderful amount of tender consideration and loving sympathy. It is dated Frankfort, the 21st September:

"DEAR MR. SIMROCK:—I write to you to-day about a matter in which I must count on your entire discretion and profound secrecy; your kindness toward me I know too well from experience to doubt the fulfilment of my wish, and I put the matter before you fully relying on your silence. I heard quite by chance, during my stay here, that my friend and fellow-artist, Mr. F. Hiller, had written to you about the publication of some new works, but as yet had received no answer. I wish very much, in the interest of art as well as in that of my friend, that your answer may be favorable; and as I fancy that my opinion may have some weight with you, it occurred to me to write to you about it, and beg you, if you possibly could, to make the German public acquainted with some of my friend's works. My reason for begging you to keep the matter secret from everybody and under all circumstances, is that I am certain that Mr. Hiller would be frantic if he had the remotest idea of my having taken such a step. I know that nothing would be more unbearable to him than not to stand altogether on his own feet, and therefore he must never know anything about this letter. But, on the other hand, it is a duty and obligation which one artist owes to another to help him as much as possible over difficulties and disagreeables and to give him every assistance toward the attainment of his efforts, provided they are noble and the cause a good one. And certainly this is true in the very highest degree, both of his efforts and his cause. That is why I wanted to beg you to publish some of his compositions, and above all, if possible, to enter into some sort of agreement with him. I know perfectly well that the German publishers have not done any very brilliant business (as it is called) with most of his works as yet, and I can not insure its being different now; but that this deserves to be otherwise I feel no doubt whatever, and this is my reason, and my only reason, for making you this request. Were it not so, however great a friend he might be of mine, I would not ask it.

"But just because the only consideration which ought reasonably to be entertained is that of intrinsic worth, and because it is the only one which ought to insure success if everything were carried on fairly in this world, and because it is too annoying to hear the old story repeated forever of the deserving and clever artists who at first have the greatest difficulty in getting their works brought out and made known, and afterward are made a fuss about by everybody when one of their works happens to make a hit and gains the ear of the public, though, after all, neither the pleasure nor the fuss can make up for all their former troubles—just because of all this I want you to act differently, and to believe more in real work than in chance success. It must be put a stop to some day, and the only question in such cases is how soon, and after how many disagreeables; and that is just the point where a publisher may be of so much value and importance to an artist. Universal applause brings them all to the front, of course; but I feel that you would be just the man to reform this state of things, and bring about one which should be at once ideal, practical, and just. Pray forgive my boldness, and if possible fulfill my request. As far as I understand, a large remuneration is of no consequence; the most desirable thing is that you should write in a friendly and artistic tone, and that the works should be published and be well diffused. And finally, if you are willing and able to carry out the matter, please to keep my share in it, my name, and my request completely secret. How happy it would make me if I were to hear from him before long that you had written to him, and made him a kind offer to publish some of his new songs and pianoforte pieces! But after all, perhaps you will only say, 'What does this idle composer and still more idle correspondent mean?' In my correspondence I certainly have improved, as may be seen from this, and in the former I mean to improve very soon, and shall assail you with music-paper (as soon as it is well filled), and beg you, in my own name, what I have begged so earnestly and fervently for my friend.

"Always yours faithfully,

"FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY."

The following extract from a subsequent letter of his from Berlin to Simrock also deserves a place here:

"If ever I was agreeably surprised by a letter, I was so by yours, which I received here yesterday. The kind and quick fulfillment of my wish, and the large sum which you send me for my 'Songs without Words'—I really do not know how to thank you enough, or express the great pleasure you have given me. I must confess I had hardly expected so hearty and complete a response as your immediate reply to my letter, and I am now doubly glad that I took a step from which, even as I wrote, I was very nearly withheld by false shame, and by that fatal worldly wise maxim about not meddling with other people's affairs. I feel that your conduct, as exemplified in your yesterday's letter, only confirms me afresh in what I believe to be good and right, so I shall hang up the much-vaulted worldly wisdom on a nail, and go straight ahead following my own first impulses and feelings. Even if I fail a hundred times, one such success is ample atonement."

We composers, though possibly more inclined than other artists to devour each other (which lies in the nature of things), are still not so bad but what we often do one another such services as Mendelssohn did me by means of this letter. But this was done without any encouragement—quite secretly—without the possibility of receiving any thanks, much less a future return—even without the satisfaction of having patronized me. Perhaps it is just the secrecy of the service rendered which makes it a thing so rarely heard of.
But nobody who has not made the experience can imagine the overpowering, elevating feeling it gives one to hear of such a deed long after the death of a friend.

The following letters I received soon afterward from Berlin and Leipsic:

"BERLIN, 8th October, 1842.

"DEAR FERDINAND:—We arrived here quite safe and well, but still it seems to me as if it were already centuries since I left the 'Fahrthor,' and as if Berlin were a thousand miles from Frankfort.
There's nothing worse than traveling north in the autumn; for the yellow leaves, and the bare trees, and cold blasts, and hot stoves seem to come upon one quicker and quicker till one is right in the midst of them, and then one sees the court carriages all out, and eats sour grapes and bad nuts, and wastes a deal of breath in grumbling over them, and at the same time bores oneself and everybody else but—Oh dear, I am already falling back into the old Berlin strain! But why is everything better in the south? The people, the fruit, the weather, the country, and everything? Your wife won't hear of its being so—but that doesn't alter it. At Leipsic I was told that there had been a musical morning-soirée at Ferdinand Hiller's last Sunday, with Herwegh and other notabilities. And then, as I said before, it did seem to me no end of a time since I left the 'Rothmännche,'* though it was only three hours before the said morning-soirée, but I was already at Langenscheidt whilst the 'Rothmännche' was resounding with good fine music. This is really a bustaess letter, though you may not think so. I was at S.'s yesterday about your message. He says he will have your songs engraved, and then, when he gets your answer, he will be able to publish them in six weeks, with a German translation, which we both thought desirable; if you are satisfied with the whole arrangement, he begs that you will fix the day of publication for him and for Ricordi. He made difficulties about engraving the Cello Sonatas, because he has just now got to engrave the whole of Halévy's 'Queen of Cyprus,' besides all sorts of arrangements and potpourris of it,

* The name of the house we then lived in at Frankfort.
and could not publish any large work at the same time; however, if you like, he will write to Ricordi, and order a hundred copies from him, and get him to put the name of his 8X's firm on the title-page, and then he will see that it gets known in Germany. I could not exactly make out what particular advantage this would be to you, but as he insisted, I was at last obliged to promise that I would write to you, and so I do it. If I have done wrong, send me your 'Hatteschiri,' but without the bow-string. S. is the only publisher here (Z. is the essence of Berlin Philistine bottled, and sprinkled over a music-shop), so he does what he likes, and you have to cringe if you want to get anything published in Berlin. The day before yesterday they gave Rossini's 'William Tell' as a new opera, for the first time, to celebrate the grand wedding, etc. (what should I know about it?) They cut it down to three acts, and announced it 'as arranged by the composer for the stage in Paris.' Since then, it has been the question all over Berlin every day, whether or not it is Rossini's true vocation to be a composer—that is to say, whether he has been able to rise to the level of dramatic music, and possesses the inspiration for it—whether, in fact, it was justifiable to choose such a subject, Schiller's tragedy being certainly a far more perfect work of art than this opera—whether meanwhile, etc., etc. (Oh dear! how good the dinners at the 'Mainlust' are!) Certainly the Philistinism of all the rest of Germany put together is nothing compared to this spiritual 'Michel,'* this immortal Nicolai;† who blooms and blossoms in all discussions on art, and peeps out of every Berlin form of speech. But now I am tired of this dry tone, and must talk to your wife in Italian.

"Illustrissima Signora!—S'io avessi voluto aspettare la esecuzione della sua promessa, voglio dire il ricevimento d'une lettera Italiana scritta da lei, io avessi potuto aspettare lungo tempo. Per questa ragione debo far il comminciamento e domandarla come sta la vostra salute? Spero che il rumore del quale Lei soffrisse allora è partito lungo tempo fa, e che la sua voce è da capo chiara e bella come sopra. Il paese qui non mi piace a fatto; vado fra dubbio e sospiroi, navigando in un mar di pene, senza ramie senza vele. Vorrei avere il coraggio di dir al fine: così si fà; ma la mia indecisione è sempre più forte di me. Qualche volta vorrei sentirsi cantare soltanto un quarto d'ora; darei in cambio tutte le opere del Teatro Reale, dove si ascolta un canto pessimio.

* Michel is the German 'John Bull.'
† Nicolai was rendered 'immortal' by a work on Italy, solely remarkable for the who made way in which he does that country.
Adesso voglio finire. La mia moglie gli fa cento complimenti e pregandola di scusare gli errori che forse si troveranno nel mio stilo italiano, sono sempre con molta considerazioni il suo umilissimo.

"FELICE MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDI."

"The fact is that after all I am a little ashamed of these last lines, on reading them over again this evening; but as I had to write to you directly, and in all the hurry of my arrival have no time for another letter, you must excuse the old bad jokes, and remain my true old friends. Goodbye for to day. Always your "FELIX M."

"LEIPSIC, 19th January, 1843.

"MY DEAR GOOD FERDINAND:—When your letter of the 16th of November arrived (it was the best and nicest that I have ever had from you, and not one has ever given me so much pleasure, or touched me much more), I determined at once to write to you the next day, and at the same time to thank your wife for her affectionate lines. I put it off a few days—and now what a terrible gap there is between that time and this!* I have to thank you for a second letter since then—another proof of your true friendship and kindness to me. Till now I could not think of letter-writing, or I should have thanked you at once, and have already done so many times in my heart. But at first I could do nothing, at most read a few pages or so, and it was only some weeks afterwards, when I could occupy myself with any routine musical work, or with writing music, that I began to feel a little better—but letters were not to be thought of, and the least conversation with my most intimate friends would bring back the dull, confused feeling in my head, a sort of stunned sensation, together with the sorrow. I have had to conquer it these last three days, the mass of business letters had accumulated to such an enormous degree; and having once begun writing I felt that I must at least send you a few words of greeting and thanks; it won't be much more to-day. You know my feelings toward you and yours, and the deep interest I take in your welfare; let me hear of it soon and often, for it always cheers me and gives me pleasure. Thank God, my wife and children are well, and I really ought never to do anything but thank Heaven on my knees for such happiness. When I am alone with them, drawing windmills for the children, putting the oboes and violins into the score, or correcting tiresome proofsheets, I sometimes feel quite cheerful and

happy again; but when I begin to think of other things, or have to see people, and also after the rehearsals or concerts which I had to go on conducting directly afterward, it is as bad as ever. So I am never at home for anybody all day, except between three and four, and sit in my little study, which I have new arranged, and where I am most comfortable; it is the old nursery, which you will remember, just opposite the front door, with a beautiful view over meadows and fields toward the sunset. Schumann and David we see sometimes; A. hardly ever, for he really only lives and breathes for the subscription concerts, and I am very little good to those just now—and so the days slip on. May yours be all the brighter and happier! I hear of great charity concerts which you are giving, and also that your new work is soon to be performed. I hope you will soon tell me about it, and confirm the good news. You ask for details of my present position. The king of Prussia has allowed me to return here, and stay here till he wants me in Berlin; in that case I have promised to go back. I have since written to him that until I am personally established in Berlin I wish to give up half my salary, and meantime will carry out all his instructions here. Thereupon he wrote to me here, that he was satisfied with this; he has also given me a new title, but otherwise there has been no change of any importance. In a word, I am only awaiting here what I was at first to have awaited in Berlin, namely, that I should be indispensably needed there. I still doubt whether that will ever be the case, and hope (more than ever now, as you may imagine) that the king of Prussia will allow the present state of things to continue. What made me specially cling to Berlin, what in fact produced that consultation, or rather combination, no longer exists now.

"The interest of that bequest, which I petitioned for more than three years ago, for a school of music, has at last been granted, and now the official announcements will appear in the newspapers. I shall have to go to the Gewandhaus three or four times a week and talk about 6-4 chords in the small hall there. I am quite willing to do this, for love of the cause, because I believe it to be a good cause.

"How thankful I am to you for counting me amongst those with whom you like to be, and how heartily I respond to all you say about it. Indeed, it could not be so with one, unless the other felt exactly the same about it. We think we shall not travel this year, and shall probably spend the summer here or at Dresden. Is there any hope of ever seeing you here? You once spoke of it. Best and kindest remembrances to your wife from me and mine; thank her for her sympathy, and beg her to keep us a place in her heart, and think of us sometimes, as we do daily with fond affection of you both, in good and evil times. Your Felix M. B."

"Leipsic, March 3, 1843.

"Dear Ferdinand:—Best thanks for your dear, good, kind, long letter, which gave me great pleasure; especially what you say about your opera, and your own satisfaction with it, and its conclusion.
You feel this now that your work is done, whilst others would only feel it on the day of performance, after receiving laurel wreaths and poems and such like; but really the satisfaction can only be true and genuine when one has finished one's work. I am quite delighted with all that you say about it, and I have no doubt whatever that work written in such a spirit, and from the depths of your soul, can not fail to make an impression on your countrymen.

"But it will not only meet with success, it will deserve it—which in these days is saying ten thousand times more. How I look forward to it! Pray don't dream of letting the first performance be anywhere but in Frankfort; it would be the greatest mistake. You know how much importance I attach to one's native country; in your present circumstances I attach it also to your own native town; they are fond of you there, they know all about you, and have to make amends for former slights in their behavior toward you; and little as I should like to enforce this for the sake of making a bad thing pass for good, so much would I do it to insure success for a good thing. Besides, all the theaters in Germany are at present in a bad state, so do not let yourself be deterred by any defect in your Frankfort theater; rather try and improve it, and all the others as well, by degrees. How can you wonder at N.'s success? They put all that into the newspapers themselves; and you who read them don't know what to think of it all, whilst I, meantime, am much better off, for I have become such a Septembriscer against all newspapers that I believe nothing, absolutely nothing, except what I see with my eyes on the music-paper, or hear with my ears. Unfortunately it is somewhat the same thing with Wagner. I am afraid that a great deal becomes exaggerated in that quarter; and those musicians whom I know to be conscientious people, increase my fear not a little. Still I have not yet heard any connected things out of his operas, and I always think that it must be better than people say. Talent he has most certainly, and I was delighted that he got that place, though even that made him enemies enough in the course of those few weeks, as I will tell you when we meet and go for a walk together at sunset.

"Your question about your oratorio at Berlin you must explain to me more clearly; what do you mean by 'being able to give a performance?' Do you want to give a concert on purpose, or do you merely want to give it a hearing at the Sing-Akademie or elsewhere? The subscription concerts here, begin on the 1st of October; there is no regular musical season in Berlin before the middle of September; so that if you come, as you say, toward the end of August and spend a few quiet weeks with us, either here or in Dresden, it would then be the regular concert season. Now do carry this out, and fulfill these fine plans and promises as soon as the summer comes on. You remind me to take a good singing-master for our music school. Please tell me if there is one to be found in Germany! Meantime I have had hard work to stop them from altogether doing away with the teaching of singing, which is almost more necessary than anything else. Thirty-four pupils have sent in their names, and the school is to be opened in the middle of April. Schumann will teach the piano, and so shall I. Next Thursday, as I hear, is the hundredth anniversary of the foundation of the Leipzig Subscription Concerts, and the orchestra is to have a souper. My symphony is out and to be had since yesterday; Gühr did not say anything definite about it, or I should have sent it to him sooner. I hunted out that scene for Mile. Schloss for her benefit concert, wrote a new allegro to it, and so helped to make a full room. Otherwise it has little merit. I have written the Walpurgis Night all over again from beginning to end; in fact, it is altogether a different thing now, and a hundred times better. But I am still in doubt about having it engraved. Many remembrances to your wife from me and mine. Don't forget your

Felix."

"Leipsic, March 25, 1843.

"My dear Ferdinand:—If it be one of the evils of separation that good moods pass away before any answer can be made to them, it is one of its good points that bad moods also pass away before they can be answered. I hope this is so with my to-day's answer, and shall therefore not inquire much into your depression, but firmly believe that it has already gone by, and that you are as contented with yourself, with your work, and consequently with everything else, as I always wish you to be, and as you were in your first letter.
Besides, if that sort of mood of cheerful contentment with himself and his works becomes habitual to a man, I look upon him as a regular Philistine, and believe that he will never do anything decent all his life long, so I don't complain of your despairing remarks. And when you declare that you have a real liking for any musical sphere of action, you meet with a hearty response from me and all your friends and all musicians; and your insane misgivings about the 'doubtfulness of your compositions' I shall again put down to the account of ungovernable fury, and not complain of that either, as it leads your thoughts to so desirable a result. And yet, to be candid, I do complain of it after all; and only hope that when you get these lines everything will look brighter and more rose-colored.

"I can write but little about myself, or anything else, just now. If the dear God will only grant me and all of us a happy spring, then everything will go well again, even letter-writing. Now I can say and do very little, but always keep on thinking, if only the dear God would grant us a happy spring. And because I don't want to go on repeating this in a letter, I will today only make haste and answer your questions. Do you mean that for a joke, what you say about the director-general of the sacred music, or does it only sound so, without your intending it? You must know that I don't get the least thing for it but the title on paper, and nobody knows whether I shall ever get anything more. I neither have the right nor the wish to interfere in anything that goes on, or does not go on, in the way of music in Berlin. This much only do I know from all my experiences, that you would find it very difficult to give the oratorio in a concert of your own—it is difficult to supply the civilities requisite for inducing the chorus to sing, the money for getting the orchestra to play, and the unheard-of perfection which is necessary to make the public really interested; therefore, it's better that the Sing-Akademie should give it at their concerts, and you should conduct. Anyhow you ought soon to communicate with Rungenhagen about it. I would gladly save you the trouble and bother of a correspondence with that society, if, on the one hand, I were not already utterly weary of them, and, on the other, did not know that my recommendation would more likely produce the opposite effect, if any at all; because everything there is done in a sort of haphazard way, and according to that strange Berlin je ne sais quoi, by which nobody knows, nobody cares, but everybody rules, from the king down to the meanest porter and the pensioned drummer. As far as one can reasonably foresee, a letter from you to Rungenhagen would be the best thing at present; especially if you can therein refer to your conversation with Rellstab, and say something about his having advised you, and so on. But, as I have already said, business being chiefly carried on in an unreasonable way there, a different plan may perhaps be just as good—for instance, if you happened to know one of the managers, and could intrust the matter to him. If all this does not suit you, and you want me to write to him, then I shall have to do that too, and everything else that I can, to please you; but, as I said before, I think I could then answer for a failure, and their unbusiness-like and unartist-like style of procedure is almost more than I can stand. Forgive this philippic. I suppose I shall be in the right, whatever the newspapers say, good or bad. I am working at the music for the 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' with chorus, entr'actes, etc., and when I have done that, I shall also finish the choruses for 'Œdipus,' which I have begun.

"I know next to nothing about the 'Tempest,' so only a third of those reports, if even that, has any foundation.

"You want me to write about Berlioz? A subject like that is far too vast and full of detail; besides, even as to his success or non-success, his giving pleasure or not, there are so many different opinions. In the autumn, when you come here, I will tell you about it; now, if you would only be very curious, and come a week sooner! Best remembrances to your wife from us both. Farewell, and may we have a happy meeting! Your

Felix."
CHAPTER VIII.

Leipsie. (Autumn of 1843.)

Since the accession of King Frederick William IV., who wanted to transplant Mendelssohn to his capital, the latter had often wavered between living at Berlin or Leipsie. He was drawn to Berlin by his promise, and to Leipsie by his inclinations. However, at the end of 1843, it was decided that the whole family should move to Berlin; and under these circumstances I received at Frankfort the flattering proposal that I should undertake the direction of the Gewandhaus concerts during Mendelssohn’s absence. Though I saw very clearly that a temporary situation of that sort would have its difficulties, and how hazardous it would be to follow immediately after, or rather act as substitute for, a conductor who was worshiped to the degree that Mendelssohn was, I still thought I could not refuse; for, since my marriage, I had been longing for some regular artistic occupation, such as my friend had long wished me to have, and a more interesting one than that now offered me at Leipsie could hardly be imagined.

So I crossed the Rubicon and the Fulda with a light heart, and on the 23d arrived in Leipsie, where a few hours afterward, whilst my wife was resting from the fatigues of the journey, I was present with Mendelssohn and other friends at a performance of “Samson,” in St. Thoman church, under the direction of Hauptmann. The peculiar situation in which Felix and I stood toward each other caused a slight unease that evening, but next day it entirely disappeared. He and David came to see me early in the morning; in the evening he accompanied us to a performance at the theater, supped with us afterward in the hotel, and was in such exuberant spirits, so gay and genial and communicative, that I felt how anxious he was to put everything on a smooth footing.

He confessed to Cécile and David that at the first meeting he had felt rather a pang at seeing the person who was to fill the place he so loved and gave up so unwillingly. How little this had disturbed his confidence in me he proved, by repeatedly telling me that it would not be impossible under certain conditions to fulfill the promises he had made to the king, and still retain his accustomed sphere of work at Leipzig. He even initiated me so far into the secret as to tell me the particulars of the conditions, and begged for my candid opinion on the subject. I could only advise him to agree to them.

He also gladly volunteered to play in the first concert which I conducted, and which took place on the 1st of October. He played his G minor Concerto, which David allowed me to conduct, although it was his duty to conduct all solos with orchestral accompaniment. It was the first time I heard the concerto with orchestra, though I had known it in Paris. It made a most favorable impression on the public that he should thus initiate my first appearance at the conductor's desk by taking a part in the concert, and it was thought to do honor to both of us.

A few days afterward he went off to Berlin, without his family, to conduct the first performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream." I followed on the 11th with David and the clever and good-natured Niels Gade, who had just come to Leipzig for the first time. The young prodigy Joachim also, could not resist the temptation of going to hear this latest work of Mendelssohn's. On the 14th it was given for the first time, in the "New Palace." Mendelssohn joined us at dinner at the "Einsiedler" in Potsdam, after the rehearsal; he seemed very well satisfied, and we had a most lively and pleasant meeting.

The performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" enchanted me. The actors managed their parts capitaly, even though Charlotte von Hagen, so lovely and popular, had rather more the air of the drawing-room or ballet, or both together, than of the elfin Ariel. The comic scenes were irresistibly amusing and the mise en scène, especially the children's ballet, was quite poetic. But above all this, even above the great Shakespeare's verses, did I enjoy that wonderfully lovely music; that alone would be enough to stamp Mendelssohn forever as one of the cleverest of tone-masters and tone-poets. The band played to perfection; Felix had had eleven rehearsals, and one saw what was possible with means like these under the direction of such a conductor.

It is characteristic of Mendelssohn's views of things that he should have been very much excited after the performance, and this from a twofold cause. It had been arranged, according to his wish, that the whole thing, with the entr'actes, should be played without any pause whatsoever, as in his opinion this was indispensable for the proper effect. Nevertheless, not only was a long pause introduced, but this was made use of to offer all kinds of refreshments to the people sitting in the front rows and belonging to the court, so that a full half-hour was taken up with loud talking and moving about, whilst the rest of the audience, who were quite as much invited, though perhaps only tolerated, were sitting in discomfort, and had to beguile the time as best they could. This disregard of artistic considerations, as well as common civility, so enragèd Mendelssohn that he hardly took any notice of all the fine things that we had to say to him.

A few days after I had returned to Leipzig, Felix also came back there. Musical life was in full flow: Gade gave us a new symphony; Schumann brought out his "Paradise and the Peri" for the first time; Mendelssohn played at a chamber-concert, and we performed Bach's Triple Concerto a third time, Clara Schumann taking the first part in it. Mendelssohn's relations with that great artist had always been based on the most chivalrous affection, and I well remember a charming little incident illustrative of this, which occurred at a matinée at the house of our dear friend Bendemann, the painter.

A large number of friends had been invited to hear Mendelssohn. Clara Schumann among them. Mendelssohn played Beethoven's great F minor sonata; at the end of the adagio he let the final chord of the diminished seventh ring out for a long time, as if he wanted to impress it very forcibly on all present; then he quietly got up and, turning to Madame Schumann, said, "You must play the finale." She strongly protested. Meanwhile all were awaiting the issue with the utmost tension, whilst the chord of the diminished seventh was hovering over our heads like the sword of Damocles. I think it was chiefly the nervous, uncomfortable feeling of this unresolved discord which at last moved Madame Schumann to yield to Mendelssohn's entreaties and give us the finale. The end was worthy of the beginning, and if the order had been reversed, it would no doubt have been just as fine.

The king of Saxony was present at one of the first of the Gewandhaus concerts which I conducted. Mendelssohn arranged a great soirée in the Gewandhaus concert-room in honor of the Grand Duchess Helene, and also played to her on the organ. He was busy just then with a four-hand arrangement of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and I used to try it over with him as he finished each part. He put off his departure for Berlin as long as possible, evidently finding it very hard to separate himself from a circle which had become so dear to him.

In one of his very affectionate letters to me he once suddenly asked: "Do you really think we could ever quarrel? I think not." As far as I was concerned, it seemed to me impossible. But, with a sorrowful heart, I must here mention the fact, that it did come to a trouille between us, arising from social, not from personal, susceptibilities. I think we were both in the wrong, but no angry words passed between us, and certainly the matter would soon have been smoothed over if Felix had not gone to Berlin in the beginning of December. However, it put an end to our correspondence, even though Mendelssohn's feelings toward me remained unchanged; I heard this often enough, sooner or later, from mutual friends, as well as from his wife. In fact, I have just now, quite by chance, come across a letter which he wrote to his old friend Professor Hildebrandt at Düsseldorf, five weeks before his death, on the 1st of October, 1847, and which I can not quote, because my doing so would look like the strongest self-praise. But I look upon this cessation of my intercourse with that wonderful man during his last years, even though it was only an external separation, as one of the greatest losses which I have sustained in my agitated life.

On my way to Düsseldorf, where I had accepted the post of musical director, I came to Leipzig on the 11th of November, 1847, a week after Mendelssohn's death. Cécile received me with tearful eyes wonderfully calm, and her lovely features transfigured with grief. She told me that even during his last illness Felix had often spoken of me and of my appointment to Düsseldorf with the greatest sympathy. In the evening there was a concert at the Gewandhaus to his memory. "The saddest thing," says George Sand somewhere, "after the death of a beloved being, is the empty place at table." I had this same feeling during the concert. There stood the orchestra, the chorus; there was the audience, which for so many years had been inspired by Mendelssohn; they made their music and played and sang—and only a few days before they had followed his corpse to the church. I could hardly listen to the music—his last song most touchingly sung by Madame Frege, is all that I remember of it. Indeed, it seemed to me impossible that there should so soon again be music in that Gewandhaus concert-room; but life must go on as usual, and the bereaved must again assemble for the accustomed musical feast!

A few years later, during a short stay in Berlin, I was one day dining with Mendelssohn's widow, surrounded by her charming children, and could not help feeling deeply affected; the ingenuous bantering prattle of the children, the graceful, gentle way, in which Cécile tried to check their high spirits, nearly overcome me. How much happiness was lost to him who had been taken from us—how much happiness those who were left behind had been robbed of!

Again, after some years, I returned for a few days to my native town. I had heard very sad accounts of the state of health of Mendelssohn's widow, who was then staying in Frankfort, and I feared the worst. It was on the 20th of September, 1853, I went to the house of Cécile's family and rung the well-known bell, which had so often answered to my touch when I went prepared for happy times there. In a few minutes Mendelssohn's mother-in-law, Madame Jeanrenaud, burst out of her room and opened the door for me. She was expecting Cécile's brother-in-law. "Oh, it is you, dear Mr. Hiller," she said in a gasping voice, with that frightful calm which often comes from despair. "I have just lost my daughter!"

CONCLUSION.

The mass of the public are, in general, not ill-pleased when to a certain extent it fates ill with great poets in words or in sounds. People pity their fate, but the misery which they have endured invests them with a certain interest. The outward radiance which shone around Goethe certainly procured him numerous opponents, and the advantageous circumstances which surrounded Mendelssohn from his birth are by many looked upon as blemishes.

"Le génie c'est la faim," said a Russian diplomatist to me one day. This absurd witticism meant nothing more than that a small amount of starvation is very wholesome diet for genius—but even that is false. Talent may be spurred on by it to the energy which is necessary for its development; but genius works by the force of nature and the material difficulties with which it has to struggle are like rocks in the bed of a mighty stream: it dashes over them, making lovely waterfalls as it goes.

The struggle for the bare necessities of life may be hard enough, but in itself it has no special merit. It is only the instinct of self-preservation, which also compels the day-laborer to work, and though the struggle may be more painful when the head is called into action instead of the hands, it is certainly not more meritorious. Another kind of struggle is that against prejudice, against want of understanding, against jealousy, or whatever all such fine things may be called; but what champion of light can be spared this? More or less, everybody has to fight these battles, some sooner, some later, and in the midst of this second struggle it is far harder to preserve the desire for creating, and the power of willing, than it is to resist the first one.
Mendelssohn.

It is certainly very unfortunate when, as often happens, both struggles are combined. Whether the increased admiration which is paid to any one who has made his way in the face of want, is perfectly justified remains to be seen. Anyhow, it certainly depends very much on the manner in which he fights.

Perhaps even a stronger, because a more independent, force of will is needed to produce great things out of wealth than out of poverty. Who has not known men of remarkable gifts, varied knowledge, overflowing eloquence, who—I will not say by the force of genius, but by superior gifts of mind—would have been able to produce great things for the public benefit, if the world had not gone "too well" with them. When people bring riches and position into the world with them, all that remains to be acquired of this world's goods is fame, and it is not everyone who is born to that. Contact with the public, to say the least of it, is unpleasant—it is like the wind which fans the large flame but extinguishes the small one—and the thankless work which even genius has to do, the self-sacrifice which she requires from so many sides, frightens many away, whilst the feeling of duty which demands that something should be done for the benefit of society, if one has the stuff for it, is much less often found than could be wished for the honor of mankind. Therefore, when an artist like Mendelssohn devotes his whole strength to giving even his smallest songs that perfection which always hovered before him as his ideal, when he strains his full power and knowledge to advance all that is best in his art on every side, he deserves no less acknowledgment because he happens to be in a position free from all material cares, than if he were compelled to wait for the reward of his work in order to pay his debts.

Or is that preference for misery the unexpressed feeling which in fact ought never to be expressed, that it is too much of a good thing when outward prosperity is united to the happiness of possessing the poetic creative faculty? Such a preference must surely arise from error. The satisfaction of a man who forcibly conquers mean cares must surely be much greater than that of one who never felt them.
Be this as it may, the spectacle of those spiritual warriors, who, like the heroes in Kaulbach’s “Battle of the Huns,” do not touch the earth but strive for victory in the clouds, is at any rate more gratifying than that of those who fight on the earth and raise clouds of dust. They themselves are works of art; their bright forms are beautiful, apart from the palm-branches which wave before them; and one ought to feel the proudest pleasure that fate succeeds, though it be but seldom, in bringing forward a thoroughly free man.

Felix Mendelssohn was a bright being of this nature. Gifts of genius were in him united to the most careful culture, tenderness of heart with sharpness of understanding, playful facility in everything that he attempted with powerful energy for the highest tasks. A noble feeling of gratitude penetrated his pure heart at every good thing which fell to his lot. This pious disposition, pious in the best sense of the word, was the secret of his constant readiness to give pleasure and to show active sympathy.

Were it conceivable that all his works should perish, the remembrance of his poetic nature would alone afford the German public the great satisfaction of thinking that such a being was born in their midst, and bloomed and ripened there.

How gloriously the Greeks would have honored and praised him as a chosen favorite of Apollo and the Muses! For “all the highest things are free gifts from the Gods.”
